One of the most singular products of Hawaii is a vitreous lava known as "Pele's Hair." It is a silky, filamentous substance, olive-green, soft but very brittle. It is produced by the wind catching the fiery spray thrown up from the great crater of Kilauea.

A New Explosive.

Chemists and others interested in the discovery and use of new explosives are now busy studying the component parts and character of an acid recently discovered by a chemist, and to which he has given the name of hydrazoic acid. This, it is claimed, is destined to make a new era in the history of explosives.

The new acid has been christened hydrazoic acid from its composition, which is three parts nitrogen and one part of hydrogen. It seems strange that in all the years that chemistry has been studied this acid has escaped discovery till now. It is described as resembling water, fuming strongly in contact with the air and causing painful wounds when applied to the skin. The acid does not seem to be itself explosive, but the salt it forms with most of the metals are described as being extremely so. It was discovered accidentally, it seems, during the course of an obscure organic investigation, and the strangeness of its properties led to an investigation, and the discovery of the exact nature of its characteristics. Few specimens exist in this country, and the acid has not been studied to any great extent.

Wanted Them to Swim for It.

One evening last week a deacon of a Norwich church and the Sunday-school superintendent were sitting upon the piazza of one of the Vail cottages, Block Island, when they were suddenly accosted by a lady with streaming hair and discolored dress, who cried: "Oh, can anybody here swim?" The two gentlemen sprang up and followed her half a mile over rocks, seaweed, and driftwood to a spot used by the guests for bathing. Then their guide pointed to the moonlit waters and exclaimed: "Oh, I've lost my bathing suit, and I can never get it again." But the hard-hearted Sunday-school superintendent told her she had better advertise the missing property in the Bordeaux (France) papers, and then he and the deacon and the owner of the bathing suit went silently home.—Norwich Bulletin.

Eurasian.

The word "Eurasin" is a compound of the two words, European and Asian, Eur-asian, and means a half-caste native of Hindostan, one of whose parents is a European, the other an Asian. Originally it meant one whose father was a European, and generally a Portuguese, and whose mother was a Hindoo: now the term is applied to half-breeds of mixed European and Asiatic blood, and to their offspring. The combined continents of Europe and Asia are also known as Eurasia and semetimes as Europasia.

All Right in One Particular.

One of the most amusing instances of misunderstanding a word is told of an old church-warden of Wallingford, England. At one time the Bishop of Oxford sent round to the church-wardens in his diocese a circular of various inquiries, among which was: "Does your officiating clergyman preach the Gospel, and are his conversation and carriage consistent therewith?" To this the church-warden of Wallingford replied: "He preaches the Gospel, but he does not keep a carriage."

English.

If an old woman "axes your pardon," she is speaking as the most careful English scholars spoke for hundreds of years, down almost to the end of the sixteenth century. Thus in Wycliffe's New Testament—about 1380—we read: "What man of you is, that if his sone axe hym breed, whethir he wole take hym a stoon?" and Coverdale's translation of the Gospel according to St. Matthew published in 1534, has "Axe and it shall be given you."

It was plain that the dark man who tossed uneasily upon the bed was at the door of death. Already the light of another world shone in his eyes, and his breath came in labored gasps.

"I wish—"

The lawyer bent low to catch every word that fell from the patient's lips.

"—all my property to go to my eldest daughter."

The lawyer made a note of it.

"I wish—"

His voice was very faint now.

"—to die in the conviction that she will get it. Is it asking too much of you—"

Upas Trees.

The fiction of the deadly upas tree of Java has only this basis of fact to rest upon. The tree exudes a poisonous juice that the natives use to mix with other ingredients to coat their arrows; it also grows only in the low-lying Java Valley, where deadly carbonic gas more or less always escapes from the crevices of the volcanic rocks. Thus is history made.

The English language contains about 60,000 words. Max Muller is of the opinion that the average farm laborer never uses more than 300, an ordinarily educated man from 3,000 to 4,000 and a great orator about 10,000. The Old Testament contains 5,642 different words; Milton uses about 8,000 and Shakspeare nearly 15,000.

Cures Scrofula

Mrs. E. J. Rowell, Medford, Mass., says her mother has been cured of Scrofula by the use of four bottles of S.S.S. after having had much other treatment, and being reduced to quite a low condition of health, as it was thought she could not live.

S.S.S. Cured my little boy of hereditary Scrofula, which appeared all over his face. For a year I had given up all hope of his recovery, when finally I was induced to use S.S.S. A few bottles cured him, and no symptoms of the disease remain. MRS. T. L. MATHERS, Matherville, Miss.

Mrs. Winslow returned last week from the fair after an absence of several weeks. The train was a long one and greatly crowded, many finding it impossible to get a seat. However hard the times may be the people on that train had not spent all their money, even if they had been to Chicago and the world's fair. The train boy on board has a face and eyes full of fun and humor and thoroughly understood his business, and was constantly busy finding plenty of purchasers for his books, pictures, purses, etc., all in some way connected with and mementos of the fair. The same train boy was offering his commodities on the same train on which the writer went to Chicago the latter part of August. There were comparatively few passengers and but seldom one seemed disposed to patronize him. He held out a book to a rather surly looking man who at first paid no attention, but the book not being withdrawn, he shook his head, when the boy still holding out the book, his eyes full of mischief and a comical smile covering his face, said, "I am only doing this for exercise." The surliness of the man was conquered, and although he made no purchase, he could not resist laughing heartily. "Sunshine has more power than coldness.

Letter From Chicago.

We arrived on the morning of October 5 at 9.30, and in the afternoon visited the famous Buffalo Bill show which is beyond description. Friday morning we hastened to the world's fair which is beautifully situated on the banks of Lake Michigan, and it is impossible to give expression to the awe inspiring feeling with which its mighty charms impress the beholder. But I can only succeed in giving a faint idea of its grandeur. Standing upon the bank its beholder obtains the first and most impressive view of the lake, and one that will remain ineffaceably stamped upon the memory. After satisfying the senses with one rapid survey of the lake the eye involuntarily rests upon the many grand structures. Then after lowering our thoughts down to the surging crowd all will demonstrate that you are in a progressive city. On all sides you will behold something that will instruct you regarding the high state of civilization of the ancient inhabitants or of the skill, ingenuity ond perseverance of the present generation. This external appearance, together with visits to the many different buildings, all give cause for agreeable astonishment and a double portion of admiration, all convince you of the strides taken in modern civilization. To the readers this may be somewhat straggling. Saturday was spent in Midway Plaisance. The one grand attraction was the Ferris wheel towering 250 feet in the air. The next of note was Hagenbeck's animal show. The animals go through many athletic performances which can be believed only after being seen. The street in Cario is replete in reproductions of the historic buildings of that ancient city. The customs of the people and many attractions peculiar to Arabia and the Soudan are shown. We played our part in riding the camel, but some became badly frightened, the worst being in the motion of the camel when getting up or lying down for one to dismount. Sunday we will visit the parks.

The Study of the Voice.

When the young student who intends to embrace an operatic career begins her dramatic studies, she will probably, if she has any talent for acting, be advised to check her impulses and to tone down her inspiration, for fear of physical exhaustion, writes Madame Christine Nilssen in an admirable article on "The Study of the Voice" in the October Ladies' Home Journal. She must not follow that advice if she desires to impress her future audiences. My comrade, the celebrated French Barytone, Baure, when I was singing with him in opera, used often to give me such counsel. "You will wear yourself out," he would say, "if you are carried away by the emotions of the character you are impersonating!" But to sway one's audiences it is necessary to feel one's self the character one is portraying.

Court.

Judge McClellan has been chosen to assist Prosecutor Butler to prosecute Deeters on the two charges for murder, one for the killing of Bachtel, and one for killing his daughter, Mrs. Lowe. Then there are two more cases against him for assault with intent to kill in the cases of his mother, whom he pounded with a board, and Mr. Yates, the man he shot and wounded, and an arson case for burning the barn. Altogether it was a bad day for Deeters. Judge McClellan also prosecutes the case of Revett for the killing of Blackwell. This case began Tuesday. The case from Steuben county, that was on when we went to press last week, was settled Friday evening. The jury had quit that evening with the expectation of having the case go on the next morning. The witnesses for the plaintiff had all been called and a few for the defense. Hendry, the plaintiff, owned the farm house that was burned and wanted the $900 insurance. The defendant, the insurance company, wantee to show it was not worth $900 and had a witness who lived near by, and who would swear he had found a buggy track that came up and turned around and he tracked it back to a livery stable in Angola and found out who had used it last, and it was Jones, the man who had got the building insured in favor of Mr. Hendry. Just what effect this would have had no one knows. But the parties settled, Hendry getting $100 and each side paying its own costs. It was a pretty nice fight. The plaintiff's attorneys were W. G. Croxton and Frank Powers, of Angola, and W. L. Penfield, of this place. For the insurance company were Frank Roby, of Angola, and J. F. Shuman, of Waterloo.

The jury as now constituted is, Samuel Lowe, Cal Grube, Samuel Miller, Theo. Rempis, A. E. Farrington, James D. Wood, Edward Kenyon, George Morell, Jacob Swinehart, George Reed, J. W. Wildeson and C. A. Platter. They are all young men, and one would take them to be pretty intelligent. There is a noticeable feature that every one wears a mustache, and that only one, Mr. Lowe, has any beard besides, he having allowed it to expand out into a set of light brown "Burnsides." It would pay about a dozen of Sheriff Ralston's boarders to instruct their attorneys to fill their pleas with glowing eulogies of the juristic mustache.

Wm Tripp was tried Tuesday for stealing a harness from A. J. Carmer some weeks ago. He worked for Carmer last year on the farm, and this year came back to visit his grandmother, Mrs. Tripp, who lives here. He took supper at Carmer's the evening he went away, and the next day they missed the harness. He lived near Bremen and Deputy Sheriff Blum went up there and arrested him on the road as he was returning from selling a load of wheat at Plymouth. He told Blum he had bought the harness of a man he met in Auburn the night he left here, but did not know the man's name—paid $6 for it. Wanted a harness because he already had a buggy—took it home and had used it openly. He told Judge Powers the same story. On the stand, Mr. Carmer identified the harness. Geo. Ralston testified that he sold Tripp a box to carry his things home in. The jury let Tripp go, as they thought it doubtful whether he had stolen the harness. If he did not steal it, it would seem that some tramp or other stranger had stolen it and by a queer chance got into Auburn in time to sell it to the very man who took supper at Carmer's that evening. Phelps, the man arrested at Garrett for stealing from freight cars, goes up for one year on a plea of guilty, but Arnold, arrested with him, pleads not guilty and will stand trial. The Revett case which was crowded out Tuesday, came on Wednesday.

The court sandwiches a good deal of probate work in between the numerous criminal cases, so that a part of our much needed court business will not be wholly stopped by the necessity of attending to our toughs.

Chicago Day.

Monday was the 22nd anniversary of the burning of Chicago, Oct. 9, 1871, for that day the great fire started. So Chicago took it for her day at the fair and set out to secure paid admissions to the number of half a million. Stores and factories closed and everybody went, as well as an unusual number from all over the country, and the total paid entrances show 713,646. Besides these there must have been 50,000 admissions by passes of one kind and another. This is the greatest number of people the world has ever seen brought together on the same place—over three quarters of a million. The crowd was all over the grounds and in all the buildings. Many Auburn people including "ye editor" enjoyed or rather suffered in the mass of human beings that pushed and jostled over several square miles of ground and all through the great buildings. The world never saw the like, and may never again. That night a check for over a million and a half was drawn and the debt of the fair was paid.

Set a Thief to Watch a Thief.

We copy the following unique item from the Angola Herald, to show what might happen in these days when thieving seems to be on the increase. It seems it did happen in this case, and it would pay McDougle to test the breath of some of his neighbors now and then:

"The tracks in Wes McDougle's onion patch Monday morning show that some one came in from the back part of the patch, and two parties, who evidently were already there at the pile helping themselves, thought it was some one watching them and ran for all there was in them. The tracks show they stepped 9.30 feet and a fraction. They dropped the sack of onions before they had run far, while No. 2 got what he want d and went home. 'Run big fraid, or little fraid will catch you.'"

A YOUNG GIRL'S FORTUNE.

AN INTERESTING SKETCH.

Nothing appeals so strongly to a mother's affection as her daughter just budding into womanhood. Following is an instance: "Our daughter, Blanche, now 15 years of age, had been terribly afflicted with nervousness, and had lost the entire use of her right arm. She was in such a condition that we had to keep her from school and abandon her music lessons. In fact, we feared St. Vitus dance, and are positive but for an invaluable remedy she would have had that terrible affliction. We had employed physicians, but she received no benefit from them. The first of last August she weighed but 75 pounds, and although she has taken only three bottles of Nervine she now weighs 106 pounds; her nervousness and symptoms of St. Vitus dance are entirely gone, she attends school regularly, and studies with comfort and ease. She has recovered complete use of her arm, her appetite is splendid, and no money could procure for our daughter the health Dr. Miles' Nervine has brought her.

When my brother recommended the remedy I had no faith in patent medicines, and would not listen to him, but as a last resort he sent us a bottle, we began giving it to Blanche, and the effect was almost immediate."—Mrs. R. R. Bullock, Brighton, N. Y.

Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine is sold by all druggists on a positive guarantee, or sent direct by the Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind., on receipt of price, $1 per bottle, six bottles for $5, express prepaid. It is positively free from opiates or dangerous drugs.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Incidental to the May election, it may be seen how history repeats itself in the complaint made that there had been no report made of receipts and expenditures of money for several years and the inference was the finances under existing control must be in a bad way.

The political majority was at this time with the republicans and they proposed to hold the ascendancy as long as possible, despite the assertion that: "Other places lay aside political prejudices, but Auburn must have her political ticket, whether good, bad or indifferent." So it has been and so, in the main it continues to be, and all things considered, the custom is better than so-called citizens' tickets whose existence is but a hybrid subterfuge.

In an election based on party lines, there can be no difficulty in placing responsibility, bestowing approbation or censure, and causing tenure of office to depend upon the faithfulness of the incumbent. The best interests of the community require that both parties nominate such men as will subordinate their own interests to that of the public and find their highest reward in popular commendation, and in so doing, good officials will be found on either ticket and party defeat involve no municipal misfortune.

The republicans put a straight ticket in the field, but for once democrats declined to meet the challenge with another and refrained from voting. Seventy-six ballots only were cast and under this one-sided election the new officials chosen were: trustees, C. Beugnot, J. L. Davis, J. W. McKay, J. W. Shaffer and F. Jones; clerk, Jacob A. Smith; treasurer, Joseph Abright; assessor, Wyllys Griswold, and marshal, H. E. Altenberg.

This last named official manfully grappled with the problem of street improvement and gave his attention to grading and graveling portions of Fifth, Seventh and Main streets with a success that won commendation for energy and skill in putting these thoroughfares in good shape and placed him for efficient services far in advance of previous incumbents of the office.

The board record showed a retrogressive course in so far as it enacted a repeal of all hog laws as a concession to town owners of swine which were given the freedom of the streets, but by constituting all the physicians of the town a board of health, the laudable intent was shown to reduce, so far as might be possible, the danger from disease, consequent to keeping stock within the corporate limits.

At meetings of the board, the subject of procuring a fire engine was discussed and the need of one, admitted. As a cheap substitute, the Babcock extinguisher was highly commended, but no action was taken. The fire fiend continued to destroy unchecked.

At midnight, Sept. 9, the steam saw mill of Theron A. Clark, located east of the court house, was discovered to be on fire from a cause unknown. An alarm but served to bring out the populace to gaze upon its utter destruction.

Unfortunate in fire losses, involving on this occasion $4,000, Clark was indomitable in spirit and promptly prepared to rebuild on a site east of the Eagle Mills, where in time, he was again burned out, only to continue undismayed his risky business with varying fortune in a neighboring township.

Close following the burning of Clark's mill, talk was renewed of getting a fire engine, of forming a company and of organizing a hook and ladder company, "whose outfit would cost but little" and supply means of assisting to save property from fire. But frugality dominated prudence, the lessons of costly experience were soon forgotten and Auburn was destined to be scourged time and again before measures for protection would be taken.

Mention has been made of the block of buildings in process of erection on Seventh street north of the public square and of the prosperity which such structures indicated. This block was fated to experience more than common of misfortune. On Sunday, April 6th, in its destruction, owners, business men and the town met with a personal and a public loss. People had, but a short time before, been passing a church, when what was known as the Snyder building gave way and fell with a crash, involving the walls of Ensley's west building adjoining, in the disaster. Both buildings were demolished. Where had stood handsome walls, there lay a chaotic mass of ruins.

The first division of the Ensley building contained a cellar, whose wall next to the Snyder building, by giving way had precipitated the catastrophe. For hours previously, this inner wall, whether from defective masonry or the presence of quicksand, had been slowly yielding and although the danger grew imminent, the event came sudden and unexpected.

Amidst the throng who gathered to gaze upon the scene, there were heard many expressions of regret and of sympathy for the losers. In addition to the loss of buildings, a large quantity of farm machinery stored in the Snyder building was crushed and ruined and besides, there was a fine stock of harness owned by Messrs. Martin & Peasley and but just placed in the rooms of the second story, which was blended with the broken fragments of the building.

Undaunted by this mischance, Mr. Ensley promptly took measures to remedy defects and insure stability and a third time built his block, the last time to stand firm and permanent.

David Snyder at once commenced clearing away wreckage for the purpose of rebuilding and Auburn citizens in practical sympathy extended a helping hand to further encourage him. The contract for the new building was let in June to Messrs. Galloway & Altenberg, and by September, the firm had executed their work and the enterprising owner soon had a fresh supply of agricultural machinery installed and had begun to recover from his losses by heavy sales of all classes of farm implements.

I. N. Cool and others, emulating Ensley and Snyder, began and completed an additional brick business house alongside of that of the latter on the west, and thus there stood as now a continuous block of six store rooms.

In May, following six months of inaction, work was resumed upon the east building known as Odd Fellows' Hall, and by the last of the month, the brick work was again finished and the handsome structure appeared at last to promise permanent stability.

Justly elated at success under difficulty, the society prepared for the dedication of their building on October 15, when the interesting ceremony was observed in a large attendance of visitors representing eighteen lodges, led by four bands of music. An address was made by A. Marine, of Ft. Wayne, the dedicatory rites were solemnized by Grand Master P. J. Wise, of the same city, and a grand banquet, elaborate and extensive, closed the impressive proceedings.

The new rooms were promptly occupied. The ground floor was taken by Vordermark & Son, boot and shoe merchants of Ft. Wayne, who thus established at Auburn, a branch store. The second story furnished excellent accommodations for the COURIER office, and lodge rooms of the Odd Fellows were located in the third story.

Meanwhile, new buildings had been going up in various parts of the town. The German Lutheran church had been completed and was dedicated during August. Enos Kuhlman had finished a fine dwelling built in gothic style. Freeman Housel, of Butler township, had put up his two-story brick residence property on South Jackson street. Philip Fluke finished the large brick dwelling on West Seventh street, where he has since resided, and James Draggoo, having bought a block of four lots of the estate of Joseph Robbins, Sr., on South Main street, contracted with H. E. Altenberg, who built for him the two-story brick which has since been his home.

C. C. Shaffer, of whose success as a dealer in furniture mention has been made, in June, laid the foundation of a store building which has been extended rearward as growth of business demanded increase of space. It may be said, also, that Mr. Shaffer after continuous pursuit of his calling for twenty-nine years, during which time fourteen competitors had been compelled to retire from the business in Auburn, signalized 1893, by taking a son Frederick into partnership under the firm name of C. C. Shaffer & Co.

Along in October the new hotel thrown open to the public became an opportune feature of the town. It challenged comparison in its appointments with any of its class and speedily won high repute as a well-kept caravansary.

(To be continued next week.)

Mr. Thomas Eggers, 139 Florida St., San Francisco, suffered from a dreadful cold, approaching consumption. He tried without result, everything else, then bought one bottle of Dr. King's New Discovery and in two weeks was cured. He is naturally thankful. Chicago and the Fair.

Every other day at 2:30 the life saving corps, located near the government building and on the lake shore, give an exhibition of their means of rescuing people from a wrecked vessel. With a small short cannon, they will fire a charge out over the water in such a way as to carry a light strong line to a mast standing off in the water, and on which are several seamen. This light line enables the seamen to draw to them a stronger line, and finally a life-saving basket. Into this one of the seamen will climb, and the men on shore pull him through the surf to them and he is "rescued." It is a valuable arrangement for the saving of life and has been of great service.

The Spanish Caravels, or Columbus ships, of which we have spoken at different times, will be taken East after the fair closes. They will stop first at Erie, Pa., and later, be taken around to the City of Washington, where they will remain as an attraction in the lagoons near the Potomac.

THE LEATHER EXHIBIT.

At the south end of the grounds is the leather exhibit, which has more strange things than one would expect to find. Not only are there all sorts of the common things that are made of leather, but some unusual things, such as canes, etc. There are goat skins used to carry water in the eastern countries—queer looking things that compare very poorly with our jugs, pails, etc., used for the same purpose here. Then there are saddles from all over the world and from many countries. There are hides of fine, lovely tanned leather, and skins and furs not tanned. We can see several skins of walrus, rhinoceros, etc., some of which are more than an inch thick. Then there are skins of other animals and of fishes, some being very fine and of delicate texture. The queerest display in the building is the scores of shoes, ancient and modern, and from almost all the nations of the earth. These are hung along the entire side of the building, and are worth a study of several hours. Then there are boots that were worn by famous men, by wealthy men, by great generals, as well as saddles they had used, including one that Gen Grant used a part of the time in the war. There is another of his saddles in the Illinois State building.

MACHINERY HALL.

Here is where one gets rattled. Such a bewildering display of revolving wheels and flashing steel, and machines that almost "think." One may study for days, weeks and months without looking at a machine the second time. There are printing presses, and machines for folding paper, and all in motion, doing their work splendidly for the benefit of tens of thousands who never saw them before. Then come the typesetting machines, to which we have once briefly alluded. Some have type put into a sort of hopper that will let the proper letter drop out when a certain key is touched, the letter coming down a passageway and finally taking its place in a word. Another kind sends out a line of words all made up solid from melted type metal. The best one we saw was the "Monotype," made and patented by parties in Washington, D. C. It sends out, as we stated, line after line of newly cast type, making in a short time enough to fill a common paper. After this type is used in a paper or for any purpose, it does not have to be "thrown" back into a "case" like other type, but can be "dumped" bodily into the pot and melted over again to be used in the next issue, etc. Then there are other wonders. A machine is making thimbles, and there we see a gold one with thirteen diamonds set about the edge, a gift for Mrs. Potter Palmer when the fair is over. There are looms weaving lovely silk fabrics, some weaving carpets, some rugs. Machines that inlay various kinds of woods more accurately, and in as beautiful patterns, as could be done by the hand of a skilled artist in wood carving. And so on, till the eye wearies, and the surfeited mind refuses a longer study.

THE FORESTRY BUILDING.

This is made up of logs and poles with the bark on, and is the only one on the grounds that is covered by shingles. Inside are all the beautiful and valuable timbers of the world, from the long, slender bamboo from Japan to the 14-foot-wide big plank from California. Indiana has a fair sort of display, but not as great as we should have had, for no state has a greater variety of valuable woods than ours.

GLADSTONE'S AX.

The ax used by the famous English statesman in cutting down a few trees on his estate not long ago, is shown in the center of this building. It is a rather clumsy affair, and no professional wood chopper we know of in America, would be suited with it.

THE NEWS RECORD.

SUMMARY OF A WEEK'S HAPPENINGS.

A Fort Wayne Limited Wrecked at Wellsville, Ohio—Death of Marshal MacMahon—A Schooner Missing—Bloody Fight at Whiting, Ind.

TRAIN WRECKED.

The Fort Wayne Limited Dashes Into a Freight.

The first section of the New York and Chicago limited express, on the Fort Wayne road, was wrecked at Wellsville, Ohio. Two trainmen were killed instantly and four others were injured, two of whom will die. The passengers were thrown from their berths by the shock, but escaped with slight bruises and a bad fright.

Owing to a freight wreck on the Fort Wayne road the limited was obliged to come in over the Pittsburgh and Cleveland track. Near Wellsville the fog was very heavy and it was impossible to see any considerable distance. Suddenly through the fog, scarcely 100 feet ahead, the engineer of the limited saw the lights of a train standing on the track on which his train was running. He reversed, put on the air, but was too late, and before he or his fireman could jump, the engine crashed into the freight and these two lives were crushed out. The cars behind piled up and fell over, broken and wrecked. The engine went through the rear car of the freight, splitting it in two, and climbed part way up the second car. The combination baggage and sleeper, which followed, was thrown from the tracks, but the other cars were not derailed. The injured were removed to a hospital.

The Guaranty Investment Company.

Jefferson City (Mo.) special: The news of the indictment of the officers of the Guaranty Investment Company of Nevada, Mo., by the Federal grand jury at Chicago, was something of a surprise here, and from present indications these concerns are getting into very deep water. It is no secret that Attorney General Walker is preparing quo warranto proceedings against the three companies now in existence in this State, one being at Nevada, another at Sedalia, and the third at St. Louis, for the purpose of vitiating their charter. The proceedings will be filed in a few days.

It will be presented to the court that they were incorporated without any authority of law; that the article under which they are attempted to be incorporated makes no provision for granting articles of association to such companies, and the subsequent act of the Legislature construing this section of the statutes expressly declares that this class of associations was not intended to be included, and that the law which requires such companies to make a deposit with the State Treasurer before doing business, gives no authority for the existence of such corporation, if none existed before.

Marshal MacMahon Is Dead.

Paris special: Marshal MacMahon died at Chateau La Foret, on the Loire, surrounded by his family. Marie Edene Patrice Maurice MacMahon, born June 13, 1808, was a French soldier of noble Irish descent. His father was a peer of France and a personal friend of Charles X. The Duke was Aid-de-camp at the siege of Antwerp and took a prominent part at the capture of Constantine, of which province he was made commander. He was made Captain in 1833, Colonel in 1845, Brigadier General in 1848, General of Division in 1852 and in 1855 succeeded Canrobert in the Crimea; was at the siege of Sebastopol, taking an active part, and Napoleon III. made him Marshal of France, with the title of Duke of Magenta.

Schooner Missing.

Buffalo special: It is now almost certain that the schooner F. C. Leighton of Port Huron, went down in the late storm and that all on board perished. The schooner W. H. Rounds has arrived here all right. The Leighton left Toledo ahead of the Rounds and should have reached here before this evening if she had been in shelter during the gale.

Another on the Pennsylvania.

An accident occurred in the new yard of the Pennsylvania Railroad below Altoona, Pa. Seventeen men were seriously injured. Under orders from the train dispatcher a work train, consisting of an engine and one car in which were about seventy-five men, was run into by a coal train. The car caught fire. Five workmen may die.

Failure at Logansport.

Kreis Bros., wholesale and retail agricultural dealers of Logansport, Ind., has made an assignment. The firm did the largest business in Northern Indiana and was considered good financially. The liabilities are $28,000; assets unknown.

Troops in the Cherokee Strip.

At the request of citizens of the recently opened Cherokee strip the War Department has directed that the Third Cavalry remain there until Nov. 20.

The Thirteenth Victim.

Fire at Waynetown, Ind.

Waynetown, Ind., was visited by a severe fire. Seven brick business blocks, a number of residences and out buildings were reduced to ashes. The fire originated in the hardware store of Hardman & Co., and spread rapidly in spite of the bucket brigade's effort to subdue it. Crawfordsville was called on for assistance, but could not respond before the fire had burned itself out. Four men at work on a roof were blown fifteen feet into the air. One alighted on the ground and was dangerously injured. Four tramps suspected of lighting the fire were arrested, but were later released for lack of evidence. While one portion of the town was burning the other was being sacked by thieves. The loss will run far into the thousands, with very little insurance.

EIGHTEEN LOST.

Propeller Dean Richmond Wrecked Near Dunkirk.

Buffalo special: Eighteen persons, the entire crew of the Propeller Dean Richmond, are given up for lost in Sunday night's storm on Lake Erie. The corpses of five men have been washed ashore off Van Buren Point, forty miles from this city, near Dunkirk. The shore of the lake is strewn with wreckage and merchandise, and the waves are hourly yielding up further evidences of the fate to which the Richmond has gone. The Richmond belonged to the Toledo, St. Louis and Kansas City line, and was loaded with eighty carloads of merchandise from Toledo for Buffalo. The crew of the Dean Richmond was composed of the following:

Boysen, George, second mate, East Toledo.

Brady, J. E., wheelman, residence unknown.

Dodge, A. B., second cook, Toledo.

Ellsworth, Mrs. Retta, stewardess, Aylmer, Ont.

Earness, Frank, lookout, North Toledo.

Earnest, Jacob, deck hand, Toledo.

Evans, ——, chief engineer, shipped at Toledo.

Goodyear, Walter, first mate, Ottawa Lake, Mich.

Hilton, Frank, second engineer, Port Huron.

Meadows, Samuel, Wheelman, Toledo.

Sargenfrei, fireman, residence unknown.

Schilling, George M., porter, Toledo.

Stoddard, G. W., captain, Toledo.

Zink, William, deck hand, Toledo.

Unknown man, deck hand, shipped at Buffalo.

ANOTHER RAILROAD CALAMITY.

The Chicago Limited Out of St. Louis Meets With a Serious Accident.

St. Louis special: The westbound Chicago limited train on the Wabash road left the track one mile south of Nameoka, Ill., resulting in the injury of some thirty people. The wreck is remarkable in some respects and without parallel in that no one was killed out of the 450 passengers. The train was in charge of Conductor Woods and was making up thirty minutes lost time. After Nameoka had been passed there was a clear stretch of twelve miles of straight level road to East St. Louis. The engineer put on all force and the train was going forty miles an hour, when there was a sudden jar, followed by the slowing of the train. The rails had spread behind the locomotive and the cars following went over a six-foot embankment. The buffet car, behind the baggage car, swung across the track and the gas tank exploded, setting fire to the first chair car and the buffet car, which were consumed. The uninjured immediately set to work to rescue their less fortunate companions. The physicians on the train did noble service. While the excitement was at its highest pitch a train on the Big Four, only thirty yards away, came by at express speed and refused to stop in answer to a signal. Aid was sent for to St. Louis, and a special with physicians and nurses arrived and brought the injured to this city.

WORLD'S FAIR FINANCES.

The Exposition Out of Debt and Has a Handsome Balance.

World's Fair Grounds special: Auditor Ackermann's monthly statement of the Exposition finance to September 30 has been given out. It shows that the Exposition is not only out of debt, but has a handsome balance in the treasury.

The amount realized so far from the sale of souvenir coins is $1,929,120; gate receipts for September, $2,263,038 against $1,694,518 for August; total gate receipts to end of September $7,404,593; concession receipts for September, $843,240; for August, $578,520; total from concessions to October 1, $2,600,307; the photographic receipts to September 30 were $137,426; total miscellaneous receipts, $669,195. The total liabilities of the exposition are only $97,212. The fire protection has cost $237,468 and the guard and secret service, $982,138. Total expenditures on account of the construction, $17,944,742, miscellaneous disbursements, $6,260,947. Total receipts from all sources, $25,234,199. Total expenditures on all accounts, $24,505,690, leaving a balance of $1,028,508 in the treasury. The total expenditures on account of the construction work and administration were $870,705, those for construction principally under contracts being $344,150.

WAITING.

That Is What Business Men and Enterprises are Doing These Days.

R. G. Dun & Co.'s Review: While uncertainty prevails, men have not known what to do with safety and so have done as little as they could. Industries cannot always wait, and in them an arrest of improvement generally means reaction. Merchants who have obligations to meet cannot always wait, and for some there has come misfortune. Speculators and traders wait because they have no substantial basis for judgment. The volume of business transacted increases somewhat, because the longer people go without clothing or food or other necessaries, the more certain their demand is to revive. Government crop reports have not helped speculation because they are not in harmony with prevailing judgments.

The failures for the past week number 394 in the United States, against 189 last year, and forty-two in Canada against twenty-eight last year. Eighteen failures were in magnitude exceeding $100,000 and eighty-four were over $5,000 each, but less than $100,000. The aggregate liabilities in failures the first week in October were only $3,491,393, though the number was large. This week the liabilities have apparently been increased.

DYNAMITE EXPLOSION.

The Entire Business Portion of Emington, Ill., Destroyed.

The entire business portion of Emington, Ill., was wrecked by a premature explosion of dynamite. Five people were killed and five more seriously injured, two of whom cannot live. The killed are James Cornwall, Chris. Eyer, Fred Eyer, Jos. Eyer, and S. E. Fowler. The injured, John Brown, John Kennedy, Chris Sheyer, James Wyllie, and William Wyllie.

Others received bruises by the awful shock, but these are the only ones seriously injured. The two Wyllies were digging a well and to further their work they filled a gas pipe two feet long and one and a quarter inches in diameter with dynamite and were tapping it when it exploded, throwing the men and landing them over fifty feet from the spot where they were working. The Eyers and Cornwall were mangled in such a manner that identification was impossible.

She Wouldn't See Him.

Twenty-three years ago Bluford Fleming of Waltz Township, Wabash County, Ind., called at the Court-house and informed Dr. C. S. Ellis, then Treasurer of the county, that he intended abandoning his family. He disappeared, and his wife, believing him dead or gone for good, married Coleman McDonald, an estimable citizen of Somerset. Her two sons by Fleming have grown to manhood, one running a barber shop at Marion, and the other being in business at Janesville. Fleming was forgotten by everybody until the other day, when he suddenly appeared in Somerset inquiring for the family he had so basely deserted. Mrs. McDonald positively declined to see her truant husband, who hung around the neighborhood for a day or two and disappeared again.

Union Veteran Legion.

Cincinnati special: The Union Veteran Legion National Encampment has finished its work. There were three candidates for National Commander, William H. Tucker of Indianapolis, the present incumbent; Col. William A. Clark of Butler, Pa., and W. B. Chapman of Bradford, Pa. Col. Clark was elected by a plurality of two votes. The other officers are: Senior Vice Commander, Col. J. B. Knox, Worchester, Mass.; Junior Vice Commander, Joseph M. Walter, Jamestown, N. Y.; Quartermaster General, W. P. Kramer, New York City; Surgeon General, A. R. Tucker, Noblesville, Ind.; Inspector General, Carter M. Riggs, Columbus, Ohio. The next annual encampment will be held at Newark, N. J.

Collision in a Fog.

An unknown steamer was run down and sunk in Boston harbor, and many persons who were on board were drowned, the vessel sinking so rapidly that it was impossible to rescue them. The accident was caused by the inability of the officers of the respective crafts to see any distance ahead because of a heavy fog which hangs over the harbor and makes the movement of vessels an extremly hazardous undertaking. Up to a late hour it had been impossible even to learn the name of the boat which sank the ill-fated steamer, owing to the confusion resulting from the catastrophe and difficulty in getting about in the harbor because of the thick weather.

Frightful Roast.

Frenzied with fright and driven into a stampede by a raging fire that broke out in the Wallace street barn of the Chicago City Railway Company, 500 horses were either suffocated or burned to death. The barns were entirely destroyed. They were located at Wallace and Thirty-ninth streets, and were among the most extensive under the control of the company. They occupied the large brick building two stories in height and extending 400 feet on Wallace and ninety on Thirty-ninth. The loss on the building is $25,000; on the horses about $50,000, and the contents of the barns, cars, feed, etc., will bring the total loss to about $110,000.

Confesses Four Murders.

William Whalen, a colored man, has confessed to Chaplain W. R. Dudley of the Ohio State Prison, that he was the author of four mysterious and brutal murders that have been committed near Yellow Springs, Green County, Ohio, in the last year. The victims were William Koegler, Louis Keys, Allen Wilson and an old farmer named Huppings. The first two were murdered at the same time. All were killed by blows from a dray pin.

Fire at Beverly, Ohio.

The Eagle Wolf Mills and the Iron Roller Mills at Beverly, Ohio, five stories high, adjoining each other, were burned. The loss of the former, as estimated by the proprietor, is $20,000, with no insurance. On the roller mill, which was new throughout, the loss is about $11,000, with $5,000 insurance. The origin of the fire is unknown.

Nailed by Uncle Sam.

The officers of the Guarantee Investment Company have been indicted by the Federal grand jury at Chicago for running an installment bond scheme in defiance of the Federal statutes to prevent the use of the postoffice for the promotion of lotteries.

An Epidemic of Diphtheria.

Winkle, Ohio, has an epidemic of diphtheria. There are over twenty cases in a radius of four miles and several deaths have occurred. The disease is confined principally to children and as a result all the schools of the neighborhood are closed.

The Wabash Wreck.

At LaPorte, Ind., Coroner Cole has rendered his verdict in the Wabash disaster at Kingsbury, fixing the responsibility upon Thompson, the missing brakeman. If found he will be promptly taken into custody.

Fire at Portland, Ind.

Fire broke out in the kitchen of Chris Hearn's restaurant, on Meridian street, Portland, Ind., and an entire block was destroyed, with a loss of $10,000.

TWELVE ARE KILLED.

AWFUL COLLISION ON THE MICHIGAN CENTRAL.

Forty Injured.

Twelve persons were killed and more than forty injured in a rear-end collision on the Michigan Central Railroad between two sections of a special excursion train from Oswego, N. Y., bound for the World's Fair at 9 o'clock the other morning 100 yards east of the passenger depot in Jackson, Mich. The first section was standing at the depot when the second section pulled in. The morning was dark and foggy and the engineer of the second section did not know he was so close to the station. When he discovered where he was he lost control of his air brake and could not stop his train, and it rushed at the rate of forty miles an hour into the train ahead, plowing under it and throwing the cars in all directions. Nine cars are wrecked completely, and the engine smashed beyond recognition.

All but two of those injured will recover. The corrected list of the dead is as follows:

Mrs. J. W. Beardsley, Canton, Pa.
Miss Harriet Breeze, Pine City, N. Y.
William B. Gilmore, Morris Run, Pa.
Mrs. William B. Gilmore, Morris Run, Pa.
Mrs. D. L. Gibbs, Wheeling, N. Y.
Geo. Huffman, Hawman, N. Y.
Mrs. J. H. Keeler, Hammondsport, N. Y.
Maggie McMasters, Penn Yan, N. Y., aged 20.
Mrs. Charles Starr, Elmira, N. Y.
James Woodbury, Bath, N. Y.
Mrs. Lloyd Woodbury, daughter-in-law of James Woodbury, Bath, N. Y.

Happening as it did in the center of the city the accident attracted an enormous throng of onlookers within a few minutes of its occurrence. The crash of the trains as they met, the hissing of steam from broken valves and burst pipes was audible a long distance away, and it seemed as though every one within hearing was on the spot five minutes after the collision. As the news spread the crowd increased until at last the greater portion of the population of the town blocked the street beside the tracks.

Ready hands were prompt to assist in the work of rescue. A hundred volunteers set to work to raise the timbers that imprisoned the wounded and concealed the dead from view. So actively was the work pursued that within twenty minutes after the accident six dead bodies had been taken from the wreck and a number of wounded set free. There was no difficulty in discovering the whereabouts of the injured. The air was filled with their piteous cries. Women shrieked in agony, pinioned and helpless by the weight of the huge masses of timber and metal. As the upper layer of wreckage was removed and the first of the victims reached the horror of the spectacle sickened the onlookers.

Grewsome Sights and Sounds.

Splintered boards were lifted with particles of human flesh adhering to them. A stream of blood trickled slowly from beneath one of the broken cars and flowed into a pool at the very feet of the crowd. Arms and legs were seen protruding from beneath the timbers. Women who had been drawn to the spot rued their curiosity. Half fainting with the grewsome sights and sounds, they pressed backward to fly from the horrible scene, but in vain. The throng was far too dense to allow them to draw back. It was among the worst features of the sight. They stood covering their eyes with their hands and imploring the bystanders to allow them to depart.

It was with some difficulty that a lane could be formed in the crowd to permit of the removal of the corpses. The local police were compelled to fight tooth and nail to prepare a way by which the task could be carried out. When this was accomplished the injured and dead were removed in all sorts of extemporized ambulances, grocers' carts and delivery wagons that chanced to be at hand being pressed into the service. The neighboring houses were converted into hospitals and every doctor in the city was summoned to the spot.

Thousands of people were aboard the two trains, and they were wedged in in all kinds of shapes. It is miraculous, considering the shape the cars were in, that any at all escaped without injury in some of the cars.

WORST GALE IN YEARS

A TERRIBLE TEMPEST SWEEPS OVER THE LAKES.

Heavy Loss of Life Is Known to Have Occurred—Enormous Damage Done—Stanchest Boats Are Driven to Shelter—Worst Not Yet Known.

Disasters Unprecedented.

The entire chain of lakes was swept Saturday and Saturday night by a northwest gale whose severity has not been excelled during the season of navigation for the past ten years. The same wind which drove vessels on the beach on every lee shore also leveled telegraph wires, and reports of wrecks are somewhat slow in reaching the outside world, particularly from out-of-the-way localities. The list of wrecks, in proportion to the number of vessels which were out in the gale, is larger perhaps than in the history of the latter-day marine. That there has been a large loss of life now seems certain, but it may be several days before it is known just how many sailors perished. Eighteen persons, the entire crew of the propeller Dean Richmond, are given up for lost in the storm on Lake Erie. The corpses of three men have been washed ashore off Van Buren Point, near Dunkirk. The shore of the lake is strewn with wreckage and merchandise, and, according to Buffalo dispatches, the waves are hourly yielding up further evidences of the fate to which the Richmond has gone. On one of the bodies papers were found which showed it to be that of Logan, the engineer. The others were deck-hands. The signboard of the Richmond washed ashore about the same time and other pieces of wreckage were cast upon the beach, leaving no doubt of the fate of the boat. The Richmond was the property of the Bottsfords, of Port Huron. She was built in 1864. She had on board a cargo of merchandise consigned to Buffalo.

The storm was the severest known to the seamen of Buffalo in twenty-five years. The rain fell so heavily that pilots could not see 100 feet ahead of their vessel. All incoming vessels have stories to tell of the violence of the storm.

Big Schooner Goes Down.

The four-masted schooner Minnehaha went ashore in the gale at Arcadia, twenty miles north of Manistee. All on board—six persons—except the captain, William Packer, were lost. Capt. Packer swam ashore with the help of a plank, a distance exceeding a mile. The sailors also attempted the perilous journey, but became exhausted and were drowned. The Frankfort life-saving crew made three unsuccessful attempts to reach the Minnehaha, but the boat filled with water each time.

The fourth effort was successful, but there was no one aboard, all having then been washed overboard.

The wreck was first sighted by a man on the bluff at Starke, who jumped on his horse and rode at a furious pace through the storm to Onekama, in order to notify the life-saving crew at Manistee. A telegram brought the life-savers on a special train from that place, and in the afternoon the lifeboat, mortar and other life-saving apparatus was loaded on wagons and started through the woods to the scene of the wreck. The rain was blinding, and numberless trees had fallen across the narrow roadway through the forest. The progress of the life-savers was exceedingly slow and it was nearly midnight when they reached the high sand bluff overlooking the lake at Starke. The life-saving crew from Frankfort gained the bluff at dark, but even then it was too late.

Dispatches from all points along the west shore of Lake Huron and the eastern end of Lake Superior indicated that the storm increased greatly in violence as night came on, and at midnight the storm was at its height. At numerous places the wind registered from fifty-two to sixty miles an hour at the United States signal station. By that time the lake fleets had generally succeeded in getting into shelter.

Wind and Tide in the South.

The town of Georgetown, on the coast of South Carolina, caught the full fury of the storm, which left death and destruction in its track. Owing to the wreck of telegraph lines but meager reports of the great damage have been received. At least nineteen persons are now known to have been drowned at Magnolia Beach, where every house was swept from its foundation, penning in the inmates until death relieved their tortures.

At Pauley's Island, a summer resort twelve miles from Georgetown, the tide rose three feet, sweeping away most of the residences, the inmates saving nothing but the clothes they had on. No lives are reported lost on this island nor on Debordean, but several houses were washed from their foundations and drifted to sea.

He was taking before United States Commissioner Leonard, who admitted him to bail until his trial.

WORKMEN engaged in the excavations for a furnace on West Washington street Indianapolis, dug out a human skeleton. The spot where the bones were found is underneath a blacksmith shop, where, some fifteen years ago, there stood a building which was utilized as a disreputable resort. The skeleton was well preserved, and Coroner Beck, who was notified of the find, conjectured that it had been that of a woman. The bones were small and the teeth were yet solid and firm.

A HORRIBLE discovery was made the other night on the Minor farm in Allen County. It is not known whether he was foully dealt with or whether he dropped over the dashboard and the horse kicked him. He was an industrious farmer 30 years old and a widower.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrews were both born in Pennsylvania, the former in 1806 and the latter in 1808. They were married near where Hamilton, Ohio, is now located. Mr. Andrew came to Lafayette when the place had but 260 inhabitants, afterward returning to Ohio to be married. THE NATION'S SOLONS.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Our National Law-Makers and What They Are Doing for the Good of the Country—Various Measures Proposed, Discussed, and Acted Upon.

Doings of Congress.

The session of the Senate Monday was given up entirely to considering the Sherman act. But beyond a discussion, which developed considerable feeling, nothing new arose. The House also was the scene of rather more than usual interest, although barely a quorum was present. The election laws were the subjects of debate. Nothing came to a vote.

The Tucker bill repealing the Federal election laws passed the House Tuesday without amendment, by a vote of 200 yeas to 101 nays. In the Senate Mr. Turpie, of Indiana, presented a petition of citizens of Richmond, Ind., asking that the use of the mails be denied newspapers and other mail containing reports of prize fights. P. M. Squire, of Washington, offered an amendment to the pending silver repeal bill. The resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Allen of Nebraska, calling for information as to money borrowed by the United States, if any, since 1885, was agreed to. The resolution offered Monday by Mr. Dolph of Oregon calling for information as to whether China has requested an extension of the time in which Chinese laborers were required by the act of May, 1892, to register, was laid before the Senate, and Mr. Dolph started to speak in favor of its adoption. Mr. Sherman suggested that the matter should be discussed in executive session, and the Senate went into executive session.

When the Senate met Wednesday only twelve Senators were present to hear the chaplain's prayer. The repeal bill was taken up and Mr. Cockrell of Missouri resumed his speech against the bill. Mr. Cockrell said the opponents of repeal stood to-day, and would stand throughout the struggle, ready and anxious to pass the pending bill with amendments. When the House met, Mr. Hunter of Illinois introduced a joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules, to take a recess that members might attend the World's Fair. Mr. Brickner of Wisconsin secured the passage of a resolution authorizing the State of Wisconsin to erect in Statuary Hall a statue to Pere Marquette, the missionary.

After a continuous session of forty-two hours, during which absolutely nothing was accomplished, the Senate adjourned at 1:40 a. m. Friday because no quorum could be mustered. The House is in session, but nothing is being done.

The Senate met Friday at 11 o'clock, and, though badly demoralized by its forty-two-hour session, proceeded at once to the discussion of the silver issue. Notice was given by three Senators of the introduction of as many amendments to the repeal bill. In the House a bill was passed increasing from 75 to 100 the number of army officers who may be detailed for military instruction at educational institutions.

The session of the Senate Saturday lasted only six hours. Mr. Morgan, of Alabama, denied having ever intimated that he would vote against unconditional repeal as proposed to the Voorhees substitute. Various important amendments to the rules were offered, which propose to forbid reading by Senators of speeches, either written or printed; to permit the counting of Senators present and not voting; to disqualify Senators interested in national banks or national bank stocks from voting on any bill affecting coinage or currency; to provide for closing debate on any bill or resolution by the same arrangement as is now in operation in the House of Representatives. The silver-purchase repeal bill was taken up and was under discussion when adjournment was taken. At no time during the day were there more than 100 members present in the House, and the discussion of the bill for the suspension for six months of the provisions of the Geary exclusion act was rather dreary and uninteresting. Without disposing of the bill the House at 5 o'clock adjourned.

THE SMALL-CHANGE POCKET.

It Breeds Profligacy and There Should Be a Crusade Against It.

"A 'Congress to Abolish the Small-Change Pocket' would be an appropriate way in which to wind up the series of meetings under President Bonney," remarked a sad-eyed man at Chicago. "There is nothing in the world that tends more in the direction of profligate expenditures. The Sherman law has had the major part of the burden of hard times laid upon its shoulders, but no greater evil to the prosperity and financial well-doing of humanity exists to-day than the little receptacle on the right-hand side of a man's coat, where the stray nickels, dimes, quarters, and halves find their way when a large bill is changed. From the moment the coins drop into the pocket they might as well be charged up to dead loss, for the owner loses their identity right then and there, so far as value is concerned. It is so easy, when passing along through the streets, in the shops, or the many places where there are opportunities to spend money in little driblets, to dip into this pocket, and it is cleaned out before one has any notion of it. To the change-pocket also I lay the blame to a considerable extent of the increase in the drink habit. Many a man has indulged himself in a cocktail simply because he had the price so handy, whereas had he kept it in a purse he might have thought twice before drinking. I might go on enumerating the evils growing out of the small-change pocket system, but I have told enough to show that the time has arrived to take up the cudgel against it and begin the crusade for its abolishment."

Punishment for Tobacco Users.

In the old code of Massachusetts and other New England States there were once very severe penalties prescribed against the use of tobacco in any form. A statute, dated 1632, forbade the use of tobacco by any person in any place, public or private, under penalty of a fine of one penny for each offense. This law not proving effective, another was passed two years later of much greater severity. All tobacco users were ordered to discontinue the vile habit. Tavern-keepers were finable five shillings for permitting smoking on their premises, while the fine for every offense in the private use of the weed, even in one's own house, was two shillings and six pence for each offense.

Should Fight Before Breakfast.

A prominent Western specialist declares that a man shot in the abdomen when his stomach is empty has by far better chance of recovery than if he had recently eaten heartily. Applying his theory to soldiers, he says, they ought to do their fighting before breakfast.

No Chimneys in Ancient Times.

Chimneys were unknown to the ancients and are not mentioned by any Greek or Roman architect. A hole in the roof let out the smoke.

Capital Cullings.

CONGRESSMEN from Chicago met and decided to lose no time in urging a bill for a new postoffice.

PURCHASES of silver under the Sherman law promise to be less for October than for August and September.

JUDGE HUNTER offered a resolution that the House take a recess to see the Fair. Mr. Outhwaite objected.

MR. VAN ALEN'S nomination to be Minister to Italy came before the Senate, but went over without action.

CHAIRMAN WILSON of the House Ways and Means Committee thinks the tariff bill will be ready Nov. 1.

CHAPTER I.

A quaint, old-fashioned, large, gray stone house, irregularly built, with a green, sloping lawn that led to the banks of the River Thames—a house that had once been the resort of the gay, the young, and the beautiful, but had now lost its prestige. Courtly dames in rich brocades no longer rustled through the stately rooms and the broad corridors. Knights with plumed casques no longer rode from among the trees. King's Court was deserted—it had fallen upon evil days, and was now known only as "The Ladies' College, Kew."

No bright flowers with gorgeous colors smiled on the lawn; no tame white doves fluttered around the fountain. Miss Templeton, the conductor of "The Ladies' College," considered birds and flowers as "necessary parts of creation," but she did not care to cultivate them.

The windows of the house were all closed, the blinds were carefully drawn. Sunshine was all very well in its way, but, as it caused carpets and curtains to fade, besides causing young eyes to brighten and young hearts to beat, it was most carefully shut out. Hence gray shadow and white silent gloom reigned within King's Court, while the large rooms were all quiet and dull, and the ticking of clocks and the creaking of doors could be distinctly heard.

At the back there was another picture. First came a large playground—it had once been a courtyard—then a quaint old-fashioned garden, and an orchard where the trees in autumn drooped under the burden of ripe, rich fruit; and there the domain of Miss Templeton ended. The indication of this was a little gate, always carefully locked, which led into a kind of coppice that opened out into broad, beautiful woodland.

A pretty brook ran between low banks—a brook that came from far away, and ran into the river—a brook that would have made a poet's heart leap for joy, so clear, limpid, and rapid was it, washing over many-colored stones with a musical murmur that told of bright, far-off scenes. A cluster of alder trees bent over it, and a young girl sat under their shade. If Greuze had painted her with the glimmering sunlight falling upon her through the green foliage, the picture would have been immortal.

The brook ripples, the birds sing, the sun shines, and the flowers send up soft streams of fragrance—all seem in harmony with the fair fresh loveliness of the girl, who cannot yet have seen eighteen summers. Lovely though it be, the face is not a very happy one; there is sunshine around it, but not in it.

The girl looked like a young princess, she was so charming, so dainty, so fair. Yet life was all wrong with her, empty, dreamy and dull. There was passionate upbraiding in the bright, proud eyes as she raised them to the blue heaven.

"Some sigh for genius, for fame," she murmured; "I ask for love and money. Let me taste some few of the pleasures of the world; the warm life within me cries out for them. Would that some spirit could stand before me and tell me whatever I wished for should be mine! What should be my first request? Make me a lady of title and wealth, I would say."

Suddenly she paused—there certainly was a voice calling,

"Miss Rayner, where are you?"

For one moment, remembering her thoughts, she was half-frightened, and then she smiled.

"It's only John. Why are all servants named John, I wonder? And, as this is the last day of the holidays, and therefore the last day that I am to have peace or quiet, what can John want me for?"

She was soon to know.

CHAPTER II.

"Miss Rayner," he said, "you are wanted at once."

"Considering that I know no one in the wide world, John," she rejoined, with a lovely smile playing round her lips, "I may ask, who wants me?"

"Two gentlemen, and they both look like lawyers; they asked for Miss Leonie Rayner, and said their business was very important."

"I will come," she said, with a deep sigh—"some message from Miss Templeton, I suppose."

She walked slowly to the house, and, as she left the picturesque spot where she had lingered through the sunny June morning, the poetry died out of her face, and a hard, tired expression came into it. She looked up at the closed windows and drawn blinds. "It is unfortunate that the sun does not pay school fees," she said, "then Miss Templeton would admit it."

She entered the bare, lonely, deserted school-rooms, where the very goddess of dullness seemed to have taken up her abode. A stern-faced, prim maid-servant met her.

"Miss Rayner, have you been told that you are wanted? It's very awkward, gentlemen sitting in the drawing-room, and we waiting to arrange it. Miss Templeton will be here by seven."

It was only a servant's insolence, yet it stung her until the fair face flushed crimson. She passed on without reply. There was an innate nobility and refinement in Leonie Rayner that forbade her to enter into a contest of words; she went into the drawing-room.

"How different it would be," she thought, "if I were a lady-boarder, and these my visitors!"

She opened the door, and her wondering glance fell on two gentlemen seated, evidently very much at their ease, in Miss Templeton's drawing-room. They looked at her in astonishment. The elder of the two spoke to her first.

"I wish to see Miss Rayner—Miss Leonie Rayner," he added.

"I am the only Miss Rayner at King's Court," she said, and there was a quiet dignity and simplicity about her as she replied.

"You must pardon me," observed the same speaker, "I was not prepared to see anyone so young as yourself."

He was very much inclined to add "and so beautiful," but he was a lawyer, and prudent. Then he reseated himself and, seeing the young girl evidently at a loss what to do, he placed a seat for her.

"If Miss Templeton could but see this," she thought, with quiet amusement—"a governess-pupil receiving gentlemen visitors in the drawing-room."

"My business with you, Miss Rayner, is very important," continued the speaker. "Perhaps I should introduce myself—I am Mr. Clements, of the firm of Clements & Mathews, of Lincoln's Inn. We are lawyers," he added with a smile at her simplicity.

Not knowing what to say, she bowed.

"Allow me, Miss Rayner, to introduce Mr. Dunscombe to you. He has been for some years past the manager of the Charnleigh estates."

She bowed again, still more bewildered. What should lawyers and managers of estates want with her?

"I must ask you, Miss Rayner, to answer my questions as fully as you can," said Mr. Clements, "and not to conceal anything from me."

"I have nothing to conceal and nothing to tell," she remarked. "My life has been an uneventful one."

"The future may have much in store," said Mr. Clements, smiling and bowing. "Now, Miss Rayner, will you tell me, first, the name of your father?"

"Captain Albert Rayner," she replied, promptly.

"And your mother's?"

"Her maiden name was Alida Clermont. She was a French lady, born at Rheims."

"Will you, as briefly as you can, tell us all you know of your parents, their lives and deaths?"

The girl was too simple and inexperienced to imagine that there could be any mystery behind these questions.

"My father," she said, "was of a good English family. He was a gentleman, but not rich; indeed, he had no money except his income as captain. My mother was a lady; she was descended from an old Royalist family that was ruined when she was a child—the Clermonts of Rheims."

Mr. Clements bowed again, as though each word corroborated something he had heard before.

"My mother was very young when she had to go out into the world as a governess. She was in a situation at Leamington when my father, Captain Rayner, met her, loved her, and married her."

"And thereby," interrupted Mr. Clements, "lost the only chance he had in life. He was well known—a perfect gentleman—handsome, refined; he might have married an heiress."

"He loved my mother," interrupted Leonie, her beautiful face flushing.

"Yes, certainly; but that was the only chance life held for him. Will you continue, Miss Rayner?"

"If I do," she said, "you must spare me any further criticisms on either my father or my mother."

"I really beg your pardon," returned Mr. Clements. "I rather admire Captain Rayner for what he did."

"They were married at Leamington, for my mother had no home and no friends. Despite poverty, my parents lived happily enough until my father's regiment was ordered abroad. My mother, for pecuniary reasons, was obliged to remain in England; my father died a hero's death far from his native land."

"He did," said Mr. Clements. "And then?"

"After that my mother came to London and lived by teaching French. She taught here at King's Court, and when she died Miss Templeton took charge of me on condition that I should teach when I was able. I have lived here ever since."

"And that is the story of your life?" interrogated the lawyer.

"Yes; I remember no incident in it save my mother's death; the rest has been a dreary blank."

"Have you any papers corroborative of what you say, Miss Rayner?" he asked, and again an expression of suppressed excitement appeared on the lawyer's face.

"Yes, a small packet. There is a copy of my father's marriage register, and one of my birth and of my mother's death—that is all, I think."

"Will you let me see them?"

She rose and went to her own room, where they were kept. There was little wonder in her mind—her life had been too uneventful for that; she thought there was some business on hand relating to her father's death. She found the papers and returned with them; she laid them before Mr. Clements, who looked attentively at them.

"Nothing could be more straightforward," he remarked to Mr. Dunscombe; "it is the same story word for word."

"Yes, there is no mistake," observed his friend; and then they both looked earnestly at the young girl before them.

"I have strange news for you," said Mr. Clements; "perhaps I ought to break it gently. Did you ever hear anything of your father's family?"

"No," she replied. "I do not even know the names of his relatives."

"You have much to learn; but let me tell you I have no hesitation in saying that your claim is perfectly legal and clear; and that, instead of being Miss Leonie Rayner, a governess-pupil, you are Leonie, Countess of Charnleigh, and mistress of one of the finest estates in England."

CHAPTER III.

The words sounded plainly and clearly in the silence—so clearly that the young girl looked up at him bewildered, lost, dazed with wonder.

"I do not understand," she said faintly.

"Lawyers are not accustomed to romance, my dear young lady," remarked Mr. Clements, smiling; "neither do we deal in poetry; the plain, hard fact is, that I believe you to be Leonie, Countess of Charnleigh."

"Will you explain?" she asked, with a faint tremble in her voice—her face had grown pale as death, and her lips quivered.

"The full explanation would occupy a whole bench of lawyers for many hours," he replied. "I may tell you, briefly, that your father, the late Capt. Rayner, was one of the younger branch of the family of Charnleigh. The late Earl of Charnleigh was a strange, moody, eccentric man; he died without making any will, and left all his affairs in confusion. Title and estate are not entailed in the male line; they descend simply to the next of kin, whether that next of kin be male or female. That is one strange law in the family; another is, that the possessor of the estate can leave it by will to which of his kinsmen he chooses, provided he has no sons of his own to succeed him. You understand?" continued the lawyer, noting the great agitation of the girl. "If the late earl had been married, one of his sons—of course the eldest—must have succeeded him; that is clear enough."

"Yes," she replied, faintly, "that is clear."

"But he never married. And he might have left all to any member of the family whom he chose to succeed him; that also is plain enough. Try to follow me." For he saw a film come over the young girl's brilliant eyes, as though she were losing consciousness.

"I follow you closely," she said, but her voice was a faint, hoarse whisper.

"But he died without making a will. He was a moody, strange man, who never associated with any of his family. I hardly think he knew them. When such an event as that which I have just mentioned occurs in the Charnleigh family, the next of kin, whether male or female, succeeds. A long, careful conscientious examination of all claims leads us to decide that you are the nearest relative of the dead earl."

"Do you really believe it?" she asked, trying to conceal the quivering of her features and the trembling of her hands. "Is there no mistake?"

"We do not make such mistakes in our profession," was the reply; "one would be fatal."

She buried her face in her hands and wept. The two men looked at her in kindly sympathy, evidently understanding her emotion.

"But what shall I do?" she inquired. "I have never had any money; I am unused to wealth and comfort; my life has been hard and lonely, dreary and dull—how shall I bear this great change?"

She pushed back the golden-brown hair from her white brow, and appeared bewildered with the thoughts that crowded upon her.

"Nevertheless, it is true. I am not surprised that you should be agitated—perhaps no young lady ever had more cause; but you must bear prosperity as well as you have borne adversity. You come of a race that has always held honor first and courage next."

"Dare I believe it? Dare I assure my heart of the truth of all you have told me?" She had risen from her chair by this time, and was walking hastily up and down the room. "Is there any fear of disappointment afterward? I could not bear that," she continued passionately. "I can go on living as I am, but to find all that I am ready to believe now an empty, idle dream, would kill me."

THE WORLD'S BEER.

The Total Amount Brewed Is a Little Short of 4,000,000,000 Gallons.

The total quantity of beer brewed in Europe, assuming an average for the last five years, is 3,105,000,000 gallons, Germany coming first with a production of 1,071,066,105 gallons of which 644,752,505 gallons are brewed in North Germany, 344,830,305 gallons in Bavaria, 70,953,750 gallons in Wurtemberg, 56,445,840 gallons in Baden and 17,083,305 gallons in Alsace-Lorraine. Great Britain comes next with a total of 874,192,275 gallons, while Austria-Hungary is third with a total of 308,889,675 gallons; while France follows with about 225,0.0,000 gallons. These are the only countries in which the production reaches 100,000,000 gallons, but relatively to their population Denmark, with 49,185,000 gallons brewed, and Norway with 38,304,990, have a much larger production than most of the others. But Russia, with its vast area and large population, produces only 65,892,870 gallons, while the quantity of beer produced in other countries is: Switzerland, 26,694,495 gallons; Spain, 23,062,500 gallons; Turkey, 3,150,000 gallons; Italy, 3,099,665 gallons; Roumania, 2,225,000 gallons; Luxemburg and Servia, 2,092,500 gallons each, and Greece, 15,345 gallons. The average quantity of beer brewed out of Europe is 830,668,815 in the United States, 36,258,940 in Australia and 4,966,020 in Japan. From the foregoing it is seen that Germany and Great Britain alone brew a larger quantity of beer annually than the United States.

MOLASSES SAVES THE HOUSE.

How the Natives of Mauritius Destroy White Ants.

The black and white ants of the East are deadly enemies, and their enmity saves many houses from ruin before the ravages of the destructive white species. The white ants, sometimes called termites, are a terrible pest. They live largely on wood. They have big heads and strong jaws, well fitted for gnawing. They will begin at the root of a great tree and gnaw their way up through the trunk and through the large branches until it becomes a hollow shell and falls. Often colonies of these ants burrow under a house and gnaw up into the timbers.

In Mauritus, when a company of these white ants settle themselves under a house to gnaw it down, the owner pours some treacle or molasses on the ground near the road by which the ants pass to and fro between the home ant hill and the house. The smell of the treacle soon attracts black ants, all of which are extravagantly fond of sweets, and these immediately notice the white ants passing back and forth. One or two of the black ants at once leave the treacle and disappear. These are messengers. Later in the day a whole army of black ants will appear, marching in a column many yards long. They march in under the infested house, and destroy every white ant in the building. After a while the army comes marching out, and each black ant carries a white ant with it. And thus is the house saved

Where Girls Never Go to School.

Girls in Iceland receive no educational advantages. Everything of that sort is lavished on the boys. The question of providing for the girls has of late years engrossed much attention, but owing to the poverty of the people and the miserable means of communication slight progress has been made. The mother has been the universal school-mistress in Iceland as far as the girls are concerned. Instruction in reading and religion is compulsory. In the fall the clergyman visits every house in his parish for the purpose of examining the children in reading and the catechism, and if satisfied with their progress he invites the parents to send the children of 12 and 14 years of age to him during Lent for further instruction in preparation for confirmation, which is compulsory at the ages of 14 and 16.

Beware the Bite of Anger.

A Vienna scientist has made a series of interesting experiments with the virus of such insects as bees and wasps, and comes to the conclusion that the effectiveness of the irritating substance depends largely upon the mood of the insect. A drop of the fluid taken from the poison bag of a dead hornet, for instance, produces a slight itching, but nothing resembling the inflammation caused by a hornet sting with a much smaller quantity of the same virus. The theory is supported by the curious fact that under the influence of rage the saliva of all sorts of otherwise harmless animals can become virulent enough to produce alarming and even fatal symptoms. Death by blood poisoning has more than once resulted from the bite of a wounded squirrel, a chipmunk, or a caged rat.

A Railroad to South America.

Some years ago a commission was appointed to inquire into the possibility of building a railroad between this country and South America. The commission has just reported that the scheme is perfectly feasible, but as the cost will be about $50,000 a mile it scarcely seems likely that even the most venturesome capitalist will go into it. If the proposed line were built it would be possible to reach Rio Janeiro in a fortnight's time.

A Queer Superstition.

THE great painter Razzi filled his house with all sorts of animals, and taught his raven to cry "Come in" whenever there was a knock at the door.

"DEAR WORKINGMAN"

THE PROTECTION TO WHICH HE IS ENTITLED.

A Writer Demonstrates Mathematically the Absurdity of the Plea that Protection Is for the "Dear Workingman"—The Campaign in Ohio.

Does He Get It?

Mr. Walter Sanders, of Montclair, N. J., has been doing some figuring to learn the actual percentage of protection to which our protected workingmen are entitled, on the claim of the manufacturers that it is all for "the dear workingman." The problem is a simple one, and he has demonstrated mathematically the absurdity of this protectionist plea. Following is his interesting letter in the New York Post of Oct. 4:

SIR: If there were not so much humbug about it, the tender solicitude of protected industries on behalf of their dear workingmen as expressed recently before the Ways and Means Committee would be quite pathetic. I do not suppose one in a thousand has ever considered what amount of protection is given to these various industries for the protection of labor, so I have drawn up a few tables, and I wish every workingman could read them and judge for himself whether he has been fooled long enough. Not only have the American manufacturers the duties in their favor, but also the various other expenses incident to importing, such as commissions, freight, insurance, etc. The relation these items bear to the cost value of course varies with the character of the goods, being on coarse, bulky goods 15 to 20 per cent., ranging down to from 7½ to 10 per cent. on finer, more compact articles. It is a very conservative estimate to put the average at 10 per cent., and I will show how it works out. The amount of protection to labor that the manufacturer gets under certain rates of duty and expenses on the foreign articles depends upon the relative value between the material consumed, together with the incidental expenses of manufacturing and the labor expended in the production of said article.

I will work out one example in detail and give the result of some others. Take an article which is made up of half materials and incidentals and half labor and subject to duty of 50 per cent., and it works out in this way upon $100 worth of foreign goods:

Foreign cost material and incidentals	$50
Foreign cost labor	50
		$100
Duty 50 per cent		50
Expenses; commission, freight, insurance, etc		10

Now the American manufacturer expends $50 in material and incidentals, and he has left $110 which he can (but does he?) pay to his workingmen as against the foreigner's labor cost of $50; or, in other words, his labor is protected to the extent of 120 per cent. over the foreign labor.

The variations of duty are so great under the McKinley bill that it would be an endless task to catalogue them all, but a few will suffice, and as the rates exceed 100 per cent. on many articles, the calculations could be carried much further towards showing how greatly favored the American manufacturers are.

The following calculations are made at various rates of duty and with 10 per cent. added for expenses, and upon goods which comprise different relative values of labor and material, etc.:

PROTECTION THE AMERICAN MANUFACTURER HAS OVER THE FOREIGN LABOR.

Duty.	Goods composed of ¼ labor and ¾ material.	½ labor and ½ material.	¾ labor and ¼ material.
per ct.	per ct.	per ct.	per ct.
35	180	90	60
50	240	120	80
75	340	170	110⅓
100	440	220	146⅔

These calculations are made upon the supposition of the actual material costing alike in both places and will in the main hold good.

In the immense list of articles of every-day use there are very few where the labor is more than 50 per cent. of the total cost, so that in actual experience the higher schedules of protection prevail, but here, as in other features, the so-called protective policy is fallacious because in those very articles where more labor is expended the less protection there is to labor, and on the contrary the less labor the more protection in corresponding ratio, all of which goes to prove that this care for the workmen is a magnificent humbug, the manufacturers appreciating that not upon any other ground could they make their claims credible or acceptable for a moment. If they were to ask outright for themselves for that which they now get under the guise of pure philanthropy, how quickly the whole protective fabric would go to pieces. One could go on with many interesting deductions from the study of these figures, but I will only refer to one fact which has come under my experience, viz., the very great ease with which the average American manufacturer switches off in regard to his capacity to manufacture according to the requirements of the moment.

To-day he is interested in the export business, and his song is the familiar strain of wonderfully adapted labor saving machinery, superintelligent workpeople, improved methods, etc., which enable him to turn out many times the goods in a given time as the European maker, and with less force of men, so he can successfully compete against all creation, a great deal of which I believe to be absolutely true. To-morrow he will be heard before the Ways and Means Committee stating with equal fervor that he cannot stand up despite all his advantages, against the pauper labor of Europe, and insisting that in order to keep his factory going he must have 8 to 10 per cent. bonus to distribute among his workmen, and fortelling dreadful disaster if he does not get it.

A vicious policy such as I believe this to be always requires great versatility and ingenuity on the part of its advocates to support it, and I believe the intelligent portion of the people of the United States are beginning to understand it and will condemn it; and I have faith enough in the American capability to believe that without governmental protection our manufacturers can hold their own in a free competition with any one, and that they will in the end win in spite of pauper labor or anything else; but it looks to me as though at the present they were exercising their brains to get as much the start of others as possible by outside assistance, and bragging when it suits their purpose that they can come out ahead.

McKinley Couldn't Wait.

The Republican campaign in Ohio was to have begun at Akron on Sept. 12, but Gov. McKinley couldn't wait. He began it at South Salem on Sept. 5, not far from Chillicothe, the home of the Hon. Lawrence Talbott Neal. Fifteen hundred people from Chillicothe came to hear Gov. McKinley, presumably for the sake of enjoying better the smashing of his arguments which Mr. Neal will do when the Democratic canvass begins at Newark in a few days. Gov. McKinley spoke in his usual tariff-shedule manner, attributing all prosperity to protection and all adversity to the Democrats. He read from divers English newspapers, which, with a soundness of information uncommon to English newspapers discussing American politics, exulted over Mr. Cleveland's election as over the death of protection; and then he read what is much more pertinent and important, a letter written by the Hon. Lawrence Talbott Neal last fall. "We stand," wrote Mr. Neal, "unalterably committed to the overthrow of McKinleyism in its every shape and form."

That is where the Democratic party stood last fall and where it stands today. The only difference between the situation then and the situation now is that then the Democracy was asking the people to authorize the destruction of protection; now, the authorization having been given, the Democracy is beginning the work, which will not be completed until there is no trace of protection in the statute books of the United States. Mr. Neal and the Democratic party of Ohio and of the United States are unalterably committed to the overthrow of McKinleyism, and still mean to overthrow it; and they have the power to do so. Governor McKinley will find that Mr. Neal and the Ohio Democracy will meet him directly and without evasion. The Ohio election is to decide whether Ohio is for or against the destruction of McKinleyism.

Equitable Distribution Wanted.

It is useless for any intelligent man to try and deny that American manufacturers, under the fostering care of a protective tariff, have made an enormous lot of money. There is no desire on the part of the general public to curtail these profits to a ruinous extent; what is wanted is a more equitable distribution, for the benefit of wage-workers and consumers, and, when this point is reached, the meddlesome occupation of the tariff-tinker will cease. He will be completely disarmed, and manufacturing business will no longer be at the mercy of conscienceless demagogues. Upon this point all intelligent friends of protection ought to be able to agree, and now is the time for coming to a thorough understanding and permanent conclusion to this effect.—Philadelpnia Telegraph (Rep.).

Some Economic Truths.

Our manufacturers, especially those well shielded by tariff walls, form trusts which exact the highest possible price from the American consumer, while they continue to sell their goods at far lower prices to unprotected foreigners. This is true in regard to agricultural implements, cartridges, sewing machines, type-writers, saws, axes, and many other kinds of hardware and tools. It is plain that in such cases the tariff becomes what the New York Tribune calls "an instrument of extortion." The American Economist, the chief priest of high protection which swallows its Bible whole, finds sophistry thin enough to justify even this high-handed proceeding of the tariff-fondled trusts. It has a column entitled "Tariff Quiz," in which it expounds the great economic principles underlying McKinleyism. We extract the following clear and lucid explanation of this iniquitous tariff phenomena from its issue of Sept. 29:

"PROTECTION AND FOREIGN MARKETS.

"No. 4.—If you manufacture goods in this country and send them abroad and undersell foreign manufactures in foreign markets, what good, in such cases, does Protection do?—T. S. Owen, Correspondent American Protective Tariff League, Lebanon, Ohio, September 8, 1893.

"It has been claimed by the party of Free Trade that Protection prevents American manufacturers from shipping American goods to foreign countries and competing with foreign manufacturers in foreign markets, but this is only theory, as our statistics of export well show. Protection does increase the price of goods, which is checked by domestic competition, but the object of Protection is to enable our wage earners to find a good and constant employment at wages better than the average rate paid for foreign labor. Protection 'in such cases' as our correspondent refers to, enables us not only to keep the foreign goods out of our own markets, but also enables us to enter the foreign markets and there compete with foreign goods, while at the same time affording more work for our wage earners at better rates of wages than are paid to the foreign laborers. Protection enables more industries, thus creating more demand for the products of each and enabling factories to run on full time, which cheapens the cost of product."

Any sample wayfaring man who believes in Protection (and such are usually simple enough to be caught on tin hooks without bait) ought surely to feel secure in his position after reading and studying this explanation. Suppose he analyzes it to extract from it as many simple truths as is possible:

Protection does increase the price of goods.

It also cheapens the cost of the product.

It increases prices that wages may be higher.

It cheapens cost to "enable more industries."

It keeps foreign goods out of our markets.

It also enables us to enter foreign markets and there compete with foreign goods.

COROLLARIES TO ABOVE ARE:

Protection increases prices at home to raise wages, but higher wages causes cheaper cost of production and thus it enables us to sell cheap in foreign markets.

This cheapness causes more demand for our products and enables factories to run on full time. Therefore,

Protection not only protects our dear labor from the cheap labor of Europe, by preventing our markets from being inundated with cheap foreign goods, but

It enables dear-labor goods to undersell cheap-labor goods in their own markets. In time then,

Protection will deprive foreigners of both our and their markets and leave them with nothing to do but to pay our tariff taxes and to consume our protection goods.

Verily protection of the McKinley-tax-the-foreigner-brand is the greatest economic discovery on record. It will not only up-build the industries of the nation that adopts it and bring high wages, prosperity, exemption from taxation and good luck to all that abide therein, but it will strike terror into foreign industries and enemies and, at last, wipe them from off the face of the earth.

O, thou great and mighty McKinley, who hast discovered this law of the economic universe whose application brings peace and good will to all—except those unfortunates not under its protecting wings—to thee will we sing songs of praise forever and ever.

The Paradoxes of Protection.

Our protectionist friends say, put a high enough tariff on a thing, and instead of an increase of price of the corresponding thing made in this country resulting, as people ignorantly think, the price begins to go down for some mysterious reason; at the same time, the wages of the men engaged in its manufacture begin mysteriously to go up. And with lower prices for the product and higher wages for labor, the prosperity of the masters grows greater! It really does seem too good to be true, and we suspect it is.—Indianapolis News.

The McKinley Theory.

The Minneapolis Tribune complains because the builders of that State are using an Ohio sandstone. As the Ohio sandstone is cheaper than the Minnesota article the difficulty might be overcome, did not the Constitution stand in the way, by a good stiff tariff on the product of Ohio. According to the McKinley theory the Minnesota people would not only be protected by this plan but the Ohio people would be compelled to pay their sandstone tax.—New York World.

The Largest Gold Nugget.

The largest nugget of gold ever found was dug up at the mines of Ballarat, Australia. The proprietors of a "hole" had gone away to lunch, leaving a hired man digging with a pick-ax. Suddenly he struck something. The workman dug around it to see what it was, and then he fainted. Presently the owners returned and, seeing the man lying in the hole, they thought he was dead. One of them jumped in, turned him over to see what was the matter with him, and then he fainted also. Both of them were dragged out, and immediately digging was wildly begun for the nugget, which lay partly exposed. The mass was so great that at first they supposed that they had come upon a reef of pure gold. When they got it out it weighed 180 pounds and a few ounces. Its value was $41,000. Being sent to England, it was exhibited there for a time, and was finally melted and turned into sovereigns.

WE BELIEVE people attach too much importance to the silver question. We do not see how it can be as vital to our national or individual interests as agitators for and against would have us think. Nor do we believe there will be a demonetization of silver under any law that congress may make. We believe there will be provisions made for the coinage of a reasonable amount of silver dollars—more dollars than are being coined under the present laws. Agitators, however, are trying to make people believe that the "money of the people" is going to be taken away. Those who oppose silver try to make us believe that gold alone must be our money. Both these extremes are wrong, and people who stop to think for themselves, know it.

SOME people appear to think that the proposed repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, kills the coinage of silver, and they go half crazy over the expected financial disaster. But the repeal would do no such thing. The part of the Sherman Act, that the present repeal bill would wipe out is only that part requiring the purchase and storing away of silver bars. It has nothing to do with coining those bars into dollars. The part of the Sherman Act still standing requires the coining of a sufficient amount of silver dollars to redeem the silver purchase notes outstanding, and the government could go on and do this. The only part of the law to be repealed is that part that requires the purchase of 4½ millions of ounces of silver each month.

GENERAL JAS. B. WEAVER, the populist candidate for president last year, in a recent speech said: "If two panics in twenty years is the best the republican party can give us, they had better step aside and give another party a chance. There are more people, more work, more factories and more of everything that should make a nation prosperous than there ever was before, and still our present condition confronts us. The situation of to-day was not caused by the election of a democratic administration. The administration of to-day is still enforcing republican laws." Republican papers and politician are very much out of sorts an account of this utterance, but Gen. Weaver has a fashion of expressing himself without regard to the feeling or wishes of the "touchy" champions of the g. o. p.

THE Ligonier Banner says: "The Sherman act was passed in July, 1890. Both houses of congress and the president were republicans. The vote on the passage of the bill, as given in the New York Tribune Almanac was:

In the senate, yeas 39, nays 26. The yeas were all republicans and the nays all democrats. In the house the yeas were 122, the nays 90. The yeas were 121 republicans, one, "Wheeler." The nays were all democrats.

According to John Sherman, the bill above referred to was passed to prevent the passage of a free coinage bill. According to Senator Jones, of Nevada, it was passed because the silver republicans threatened to defeat the McKinley bill if the republicans of the two houses refused to assent to the provision for the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces of silver each month.

WE ARE often asked what congress is doing. It has finished but little that it has begun. The House passed the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman act at an early date. Then the Senate took it up and has been at it more or less ever since, as shown by an article we have elsewhere. It might possibly pass the Senate if its opponents would let it come to a vote. The House is considering the repeal of the law about having U. S. Supervisors of Elections, but has not passed the bill. They are also working for a revision of the tariff, and for a graduated income tax that will produce enough money to make up the lack caused by lowering the tariff. We should not grumble till congress has a fair chance. We believe they mean to do some good, but so many interests are at stake, that it is difficult to do anything.

CONGRESS is trying to repeal the "Force Bill," that is, the federal election law that permits the general government to override the laws of any state. This ought to be done. The general government has no right to break a state law anymore than its citizens have. Take, for example, the election laws of this state. No state has a better, more thorough, or fairer law. All parties are secure in their rights. Yet under the federal election law, the most violent partisan can be put into a voting room and remain there all day, though the state law says plainly that no other person except the election board provided by the state law may go within fifty feet of the outside of that room. It is a wanton and unnecessary violation of our state laws, for we already provide for an equal number of men of opposite parties to sit on the board and these men are, to say the least, as capable, as intelligent and as honest, as the men the general government or its extreme friends will be likely to select.

Last Wednesday evening the senate "went into continuous session," as it is called, in order to get a vote on the repeal of the Sherman act. Strange as it may seem, the senate has no rule by which it can compel senators to take a vote on any question they are debating. Hence they can keep right on talking, as they have done on this repeal bill for over three weeks. Senator Voorhees, who favored the repeal bill and has charge of it, had repeatedly asked to have a vote taken, and said he would be satisfied, even if defeated. What he wanted and what he believed the people wanted was to have the senate stop talking and take a vote. Then if the majority of the senators wanted the Sherman act repealed, it would be done, as the bill had already passed the House. But if they did not want it repealed, the vote would show it, and he and the country would not complain. But the extreme free silver men of all parties, democrats, republicans and populists, refused to come to a vote, and time dragged on. Twenty senators had made set speeches for repeal, and thirty-two had made speeches against it. This showed that a more than reasonable time had been given for discussion, and a vote should be taken. Senator Voorhees repeatedly asked if they would come to a vote, and also if they would be willing to set a future day, when they would vote, and they would not agree to it. So being determined to secure a vote if possible, when the time came Wednesday evening to adjourn, Voorhees being in charge of the bill, was the proper man to move an adjournment, as he had been doing for weeks. But he refused, and instead asked to have the session continued till the senators were willing to vote. This plan seems to be the only way they have of getting a vote, when even a small number of senators oppose taking the vote. So the senate had to stick to work.

At a little after 8 that evening Senator Allen, of Nebraska, took up a long speech he had ready and kept it up till next forenoon, speaking all night, fourteen hours in all, except, a rest he would get now and then, when some friend would claim there were not enough senators present to form a quorum. When a member claims this, their rules compel a calling of the roll, and this takes several minutes, especially, as some of the senators always have an explanation to make. After calling the roll Mr. Allen would go on with his speech, which in fact was no real speech, for he would talk about almost anything, and read extracts from books, documents and newspapers—any way to put in the time. In the meantime senators would go into the cloak rooms and fall asleep, or even sleep in their seats, till another roll call roused them.

Martin, of Kansas, another senator populist followed Allen, and spoke more or less till the middle of Thursday after noon. Then other silver senators, followed with long speeches, mixed in with roll calls till 1:45 Friday morning, when it was found so many senators had tired out and gone home, that no quorum was really there at last, and of course no vote could be taken on the measure if the obstructing senators had been willing, which they were not. Seeing the further struggle would be useless, Senator Voorhees made a motion to adjourn, which was carried unanimously.

COLONEL GRAHAM, OF POSEY COUNTY

When Colonel Graham, of Posey county, Ind., left town for Trenton yesterday he put in his pocket two of the best imported cigars that he could buy. The colonel is a confirmed cigarette smoker, but he always carries cigars for self protection when he travels. Since he left Posey county he has developed a discriminating nose for tobacco. A rank cigar makes him more peevish than "knees" in his trousers. There are few smokers of bad cigars who will not throw away a half burned stump to accept one of the colonel's good cigars, with the graceful apology that always goes with it.

"Why, do you know," said Colonel Graham the other day, "there are no cigars in Indiana so rank as those that are smoked in New Jersey. They are the brand that will kill vegetation, and I always carry a cigar or two to give away on the smoking car. Why, it's enough to make a man fretful."

Colonel Graham's seat in the smoker was shared yesterday by a man with no taste in tobacco. He sniffed contemptuously at the colonel's cigarette, and puffed contentedly at a very bad cigar with a dark, shiny wrapper. Colonel Graham was growing seasick. He threw away his cigarette, and drawing a cigar from his pocket said to the man beside him:

"Pardon me, sir, but may I trouble you for a light!"

"Sure, Mike," replied the man, and he handed Colonel Graham a cigar that had just been lighted. Colonel Graham carefully lighted his own cigar, and with apparent absentmindedness tossed the other out of the window.

"Well, I'll be"——

"No, don't," interrupted Colonel Graham, "I really wasn't thinking what I was doing. Please accept one of my cigars and permit me to offer an apology. I am very absentminded—at times."

The man looked at the cigar the colonel gave him and said:

"Looks pretty good. Better'n mine, I guess. I pay three dollars a hundred for mine."

"That cigar cost twenty-five dollars a hundred, and is pretty fair, I think," replied the colonel.

"H'm," said the man as he bit the end off. Then he leaned over and said:

"Will you give me a light now?"

Colonel Graham offered his cigar. The man lighted his own from it with chuckles of satisfaction. Then he leaned back comfortably and tossed Colonel Graham's cigar out of the window.

"Why, you"——

"Don't," said the man. "When I think of the tariff on cigars I go into a trance, and I'm not responsible for what I do. Let me offer you one of my cigars," and he pulled out one of the three dollar a hundred brand and handed it to Colonel Graham.

"Why, you"——

"Now, don't, I say," interrupted the man. "This is my station, but you can get a light from the man in front. Much obliged for your smoke. Goodby," and he was off the car.

Colonel Graham returned to New York last night and announced that his system was shattered. Hereafter he will ride in the drawing room car and smoke cigarettes.—New York Sun.

Foot Notes.

Never wear a nice pair of shoes when you must needs wear rubbers. It spoils them more quickly than anything else. Have an old pair to wear under rubbers, and thus save your good shoes and enjoy the comfort the older ones give. When soles are worn thin use insoles—they will save both shoes and stockings. These are cut from sole leather. When suffering from corns cut out the place over them from an old shoe and cover with a neat patch. It is a sure cure.—Detroit Free Press.

A Bright Four-year-old.

The clergyman was a guest at dinner one day, Cream was offered him with his dessert, but he declined, gallantly saying "that would be painting the lily." A few days later Hattie's aunt, who had artistic tastes, sent the child to pick for her a brilliant lily which she wished to copy. The little four-year-old started on the errand, but as she reached the foot of the piazza steps she turned, looked up at her aunt and said, "Would you paint the lily?"—New York Tribune.

Resolutions.

"DEATH LOVES A SHINING MARK."

Whereas: In view of the loss we have sustained by the decease of our friend and associate, Minnie Stonebraker, and of the still heavier loss sustained by those who were nearest and dearest to her; therefore, be it

Resolved, that in her death, the Y. P. S. C. E. laments the loss of a sister who was ever ready to proffer the hand of aid and the voice of sympathy to the needy and distressed; an active member of this society, whose utmost endeavors were exerted for its welfare and prosperity; a friend and companion ~~who was~~ dear to us all; and that to us, who knew her so intimately, and who appreciated her worth so highly, her departure causes sorrow which time alone can efface.

Resolved, That in her death the church has lost a faithful member and this society an earnest worker. And we bow in humble submission to the will of Him who doeth all things well. And that we greatly rejoice in the evidence afforded us of her preparation for transition, this preparation being evidenced by the beautiful patience during the long days and nights of her suffering.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the records of the society and published in at least two of the county papers, and a copy of the same sent to the family of the deceased.

"Gone, but not forgotten."

CHEAP B. & O. EXCURSIONS.

To World's Fair, Oct. 10, 14, 17, 21, 24.

On the above dates the B. & O. Ry. will sell excursion tickets to Chicago, Illinois, at the rate of one fare for the round trip. Tickets will be good returning on all trains ten days from date of sale.

Passengers will be carried direct to the World's Fair Grounds if desired.

For information in regard to time of trains and rates call on or address any B. & O. ticket agent, or L. A. Allen, Ass't Gen. Passenger Agent, Chicago.

The B. & O. to the Fair.

The B. & O. gives each passenger a transfer ticket when the train reaches Rock Island Junction in South Chicago. This ticket is good on their suburban train that runs from that point to the World's Fair Hotel, just south of the grounds, and from there one can easily walk in. Or, if the passenger stays on this suburban train, it will carry him right into the grounds in the "Terminal Station" without walking at all. Here he can buy his tickets into the grounds, and there he is. We make this statement again, as so many passengers do not seem to understand it, and the arrangement the road has made is a great accommodation to them as well as a saving, and makes the road a great deal of extra work for no extra pay.

Cut out and keep the B. & O. and other railway notices we have, so as to know what days you can get half rates to Chicago. Sometimes a man carelessly allows the hours to slip by and then goes after midnight to buy a half fare ticket, when the agent is obliged to refuse, because the day named has gone by. We know of several good men who could have saved $3.00 by cutting out and keeping these COURIER notices.

We are sorry to see the Dispatch take Bro. McDonald, of the Banner, to task for not spelling the word "Swede" correctly. The mistake is a very common one, but in the case of Bro. McDonald it had been taken bodily from the Clipper, which can get in more wild spelling and untamed grammar than any other publication on earth. Exchanges should note this fact, and not forget also, that the Clipper's information is as faulty as its education. It is really laughable to see some of the foundationless items of the Clipper gobbled up by neighboring exchanges, and finding their way back here where the truth of the matter is known. But to return to the "Swede" matter. We all make errors, and the Dispatch as often as any, both in spelling and in grammatical construction. The very page containing the criticism may be cited as an example. As Mrs. Partington would say, "We are all poor creaturs."

Simon Hoisington has been visiting his father and mother, as well as C. P. Houser's family for a few days. He has been at Chicago for some time, where he is employed by a syndicate doing a heavy patent right business.

John Wagner, of Franklin, was here Saturday. He reports that his two visits to the fair have not prevented him taking and paying for about all the papers in the county. And he reads them all, to, as well as city papers.

The Revett trial, called over from Butler, a good many of the COURIER's acquaintances. Ex-auditor Tomlinson, Mr. Tyson, M. F. Long, Daniel Tomlinson, Mr. Brattin, Mr. Stoy, G. H. Mc Nabb, besides attorneys, Baxter and Coats, and many others.

Gen. Blair informs us that the Waterloo fair was a success financially as well as otherwise. The ordinary expenses for the year will be fully met by the receipts. The trotting was the best ever had, the fastest time made being 2-22, and the fastest made on that track up to that date being 2-26.

John Becker, of Corunna, has moved to Auburn and bought property in town, as well as a forty-acre farm near by. He has not yet decided what business he will go into, but an energetic man like him will not remain idle long. He is a good blacksmith, but has not worked at the trade for several years.

Mr. Sawvel is off to the fair, as are also about fifty other Auburnites. The most of them stop at Mr. Harrison's at Windsor Park. He and his wife have been so accommodating and helpful, that all who have been there appreciate their friendly services, Even when their own rooms were all full, they would help strangers to get good rooms elsewhere. It was a great help to people coming into a great strange town full of people who were themselves strangers to the town and its location.

John R. Lamson, a former foreman of the COURIER, made the friends here a visit from Thursday last to Monday. He is a brother to Mrs. Barns and Mrs. Kelley, and his wife is a sister to Mrs. Penfield. He has many friends here, who gave him a hearty welcome. He and his wife had been two or three weeks at the fair, and he stopped off here on his way home, while she visited relatives at Crestline, Ohio. Their home is in Washington, D. C., where he has a good position in the government printing office.

Chicago Letter.

Sunday Oct. 8, we visited Lincoln Park. This park has 250 acres and all that can contribute to nature has been directed upon the project of beautifying this place and the winding avenues, the glassy lakes, the rich foliage, the once gorgeous beds of flowers and masses of shrub combine to produce as attractive a picture as mortal mind could conceive or human eyes delight in. Aside from the natural beauties of the place Lincoln park possesses other attractions in the way of statuary and a zoological collection which exercises a peculiar charm for visitors. Notable among the former, is the Grant monument, facing Lake Michigan. Oct. 9 was Chicago day at the fair. She seemed to have displayed all her beauty and magnificence, and the air thrilled with national pride. All seemed deeply interested in the grand scene presented by the World's fair City. This lovely place is throbbing the earth from its very center. Here are all earth's industries, resources and pleasures displayed in so small a place that we have only to look on and admire the works of all nations. Joyous faces, sweet music and fluttering flags made the city a scene of splendor. Gay streamers floated from boat, pinnacle and housetop, and streams of sight seers—strangers from afar—all lent their aid to the over joyous scene of the day. Thursday afternoon we took a topographical view of Midway Plaisance, from the Ferris wheel, but unfortunately a mist came up from the lake, obscuring the view of the city. On Friday we visited the Libbey Glass Works which is immense.

Publishing the Allowances.

It would be funny were it not so common to hear newspapers complain about receiving or not receiving the copy of the commissioners' allowances. The commissioners are willing to furnish the copy to all, but their experience has been that half this copy was not used, either because the papers to which it was sent did not have room, or did not care enough about the matter. It was especially funny to hear the Garrett Clipper tell its readers that the thing did not amount to much anyway, for it was that sheet which after the commissioners had begun to give out this copy to all, that claimed itself as the inventor and advocate of the plan—claimed all the glory. But after all its boasting, it never published the full list even when the commissioners furnished copy. The commissioners are still willing to pay for a copy for each paper in the county if those papers will agree to publish them. There is another phase of this matter to which it is our duty to allude, not on our own account, but in a spirit of fairness to the commissioners and county officers. The list of allowances is published in the COURIER each quarter and paid for at a cheap rate as provided by law, and the commissioners have no right to pay for its publication in any other paper. The law provides that it be published in the paper having the greatest circulation in the county. The COURIER is that paper. Some years ago the Dispatch, then called the "Republican," employed an attorney, P. V. Hoffman, to go before the board of commissioners and request them to give this little item of work to that paper instead of the COURIER, claiming for their paper the largest circulation. The commissioners required from both papers a sworn statement. This statement the COURIER furnished promptly and the Republican dropped the matter as promptly. Whether it furnished a sworn statement or not we never learned. We give this much of a statement because it does not seem to be understood and the commissioners should not be blamed for a thing the law compels them to do. The law is probably a good one. All such public reports should be published in the paper that would reach the greatest number of people, especially if its circulation was pretty evenly distributed in all parts of the county.

THE ragpicker seldom grumbles. He, of all men, is content to take things as he finds them.

THE increase of absinthe drinking in France shows a most deplorable combination of Gaul and wormwood.

MANY a young man has a great future ahead of him. The great difficulty is that it persists in keeping there.

DON'T cultivate a thirst that will create a vacancy in your pocket while distending your stomach into bay window-like proportions.

THE Georgia melon crop will net the growers $250,000 this year; it will cost the consumers more than that amount for Jamaica ginger alone.

WHENEVER a man gets his tax bill he ought to stop thinking about the amount he has got to pay, and think instead of all the good things that he gets in exchange for it.

WHY raise a rumpus because Mrs. Vanderbilt pays $150,000 for a dog collar? The money goes into circulation, doesn't it? Wouldn't the general public be benefited if she were to pay $1,000,000 apiece for her dog collars?

THE pensive poet of a contemporary arises to remark that the World's Fair is "a vision as fair as a soul-swept dream." With full confidence that a soul-swept dream is something unusually nice, we concur in saying it is.

JOE HOWARD tells the readers of a New York paper that "frogs' legs are now so large that they ought not to be eaten with champagne frappe." This will be bitter news for the New York workingmen who have been rioting for bread.

A HIGHWAYMAN waylaid an Indianapolis editor the other night, and we are pleased to note that the newspaper man put a scare head on his adversary and filled him full of double-leaded matter. The true editor never forgets his business.

IT does look hard that, during these hard times, the man who wrote "After the Ball" should be drawing $1,000 a day from the sale of the song. Yet that is the news which comes well vouched for from the home of the writer in Milwaukee.

THE New York Stock Exchange should stick to the practice which it has started, of suspending members who circulate false reports about the standing of business men and institutions. This sort of lying damages not only those whom it is directed against, but often hurts other interests and persons by exciting general distrust and breaking down the markets. Men who commit such offenses deserve severe punishment.

ANOTHER horrible railway casualty sends a shudder over the country, and, like the one near Colehour, it could not have occurred had the block signal system been in operation. The parsimony of great railway corporations is responsible for three-quarters of the lives lost by accidents, and that parsimony will continue to rule until federal legislation makes smash-ups so expensive that no road can afford to neglect any precautions looking to their avoidance.

IT turns out that Mr. Furniss, of Punch, did not have his ear tweaked by Mr. McNeill after all, though his experience was almost as mortifying as that would have been. According to the story of an eye-witness Mr. McNeill grabbed Mr. Furniss by the coat collar and tapped him excitedly on the chest once or twice, meanwhile expressing his opinion of the artist in unparliamentary language. He might have proceeded to extremities, but Dr. Tanner came along and rescued the little cartoonist from his burly captor.

TENNESSEE has solved—or thinks she has—her convict labor problem by purchasing an immense tract of coal land and going into the coal mining and shipping business, the mining, of course, being done by the State's prisoners. But it is to be feared that the officials will find that they have but stirred up another hornet's nest. A new howl will come from the coal producers, who formerly rented the convicts, while the free laborers who stirred up the trouble over the rent system, will be none the less vehement in their protests against convict competition in its new garb.

A CURIOUS and unusual suit was tried before an Ohio court the other day. A young lady, dressed in her Sunday best, was passing the residence of a gentleman a few days since. He happened to be sprinkling his lawn with a hose, and accidentally turned it full on the passing lady, deluging her delicate silk dress with water, and completely ruining it. She sued him for damages, and received ten dollars and costs. It is a precedent that might well be pushed elsewhere. It is not at all an uncommon thing for expensive clothing to be ruined by careless people sprinkling lawns or scrubbing side walks, or painting awnings, or slopping around with a whitewash brush, and if they knew that they could be held responsible for the damage done, it might have the effect of making them a little more careful.

FRANCE begins early with an international exposition. The decree announcing that one would be held in 1900 appeared a year ago. This month the commission to prepare for the exposition has been constituted with M. Albert Picard at its head. It is composed of the heads of a large number of government bureaus and departments from the Ministries of the Interior, Colonies and Public Works. This brings together a group of trained administrators in place of a heterogeneous mass of commissioners without experience. Influenced by the example of Chicago, the next Paris Fair will be held in the Bois, where water can be secured and a group of buildings erected.

ACCORDING to a statement filed in the Supreme Court by one John Swope, of Pennsylvania, Messrs. Henry Villard, Charles L. Colby, Colgate Hoyt, Edwin H. Abbot, Thomas F. Oakes, Henry C. Rouse and Henry C. Payne are villains of the deepest dye. Swope accuses these eminent gentlemen of robbing him and other stockholders in the Northern Pacific Railway of a bagatelle of some $20,000,000. Perhaps they did—and perhaps they didn't. It doesn't make any difference to the public either way. The sum involved precludes the possibility of criminal prosecution or disgrace, and the railroads concerned keep right on charging full fare to all points North and West.

POLYGAMOUS marriages in Utah, according to the report of the Utah Commission, are a thing of the past. Would that they were in fact as they are in law a thing of the past. But the sorry fact is that under all sorts of makeshifts many of the polygamists are still maintaining their unlawful relations. The more hardy criminals are violating the United States law openly, relying upon the reluctance of their neighbors to give testimony. Others, who live near the border, with more fear of the law and better facilities for violating it, are maintaining separate establishments just over the line of Utah in the State of Idaho. But ultimately the force there is in national law, with a constabulary not dependent upon local support, will reach these cases and rid the far West of this blight.

IT seems that the "little fellows" are not the only ones who have held their spare cash in hand instead of depositing it in bank during this season of depression. President Depew is quoted as saying that the New York Central Railroad Company "has adopted the old-fashioned course of placing its cash receipts in safes instead of depositing them in banks," so that there will be no trouble in paying the workmen, though the New York Chemical Bank has refused to furnish the $800,000 required for the monthly pay-roll of the company. Of course, if it had not been for such hoarding by the New York Central and others there would have been no refusal by the bank to supply the currency called for. And this raises the question why the bank should have been called on for the money if the company had it in hand already.

One of the educational phases of the World's Fair has been the teaching of railroad managers the possibilities of their own roads. It may be admitted that the railroad men have not on all occasions shown themselves particularly grateful for the knowledge they have acquired, but it will be useful to them hereafter when they have occasion to handle a large volume of passenger traffic at one time. The railroad officials, with one voice, declared that they had almost reached the limit of their facilities. They asserted that an increase of 25 per cent. in the number of passengers would swamp them. But there came an increase of 100 per cent. and the railroads were equal to the occasion. Trains were run in ten sections and single trains of twenty-two cars hauled into the city without accident or delay. The elasticity and capacity of the American railway system have been shown to the astonishment even of the transportation companies themselves. The lesson is valuable in more senses than one to the railroad officials who were ready to surrender before the real shock of battle had come.

The Cause of the Pause.

Scene—A grand dinner party.

Fraulein Helene from Berlin enjoyed herself famously, for her neighbor at the table was Baron von Alderskiau, a gentleman of refined manners and brilliant wit.

"Then you are opposed to the agitation for the emancipation of women?"

"At least I should like it to take some other form than that contemplated by its present leaders, mein fraulein.

"How do you mean, Herr Baron?"

Here the Baron suddenly turned away and made no reply. Helene repeated her question and anxiously waited for an answer, which did not come, for the Baron now seemed entirely oblivious of her presence.

Deeply hurt, the young lady rose and left the table. Mrs. Schinkle hastened after her.

"What is the matter, child?"

In a tone half stifled with sobs, Helene related to the hostess what had passed, and ended by saying:

"Can I have offended him?"

"Oh, dear, no!" said Mrs. Schinkle, laughing heartily. "This Baron was obtained from an agency for the hire of dinner guests, and as we thought that dinner would be over by 9 we engaged him only till that time—the clock struck when he ceased talking."—Boston Globe.

ALONG THE FRONTIER

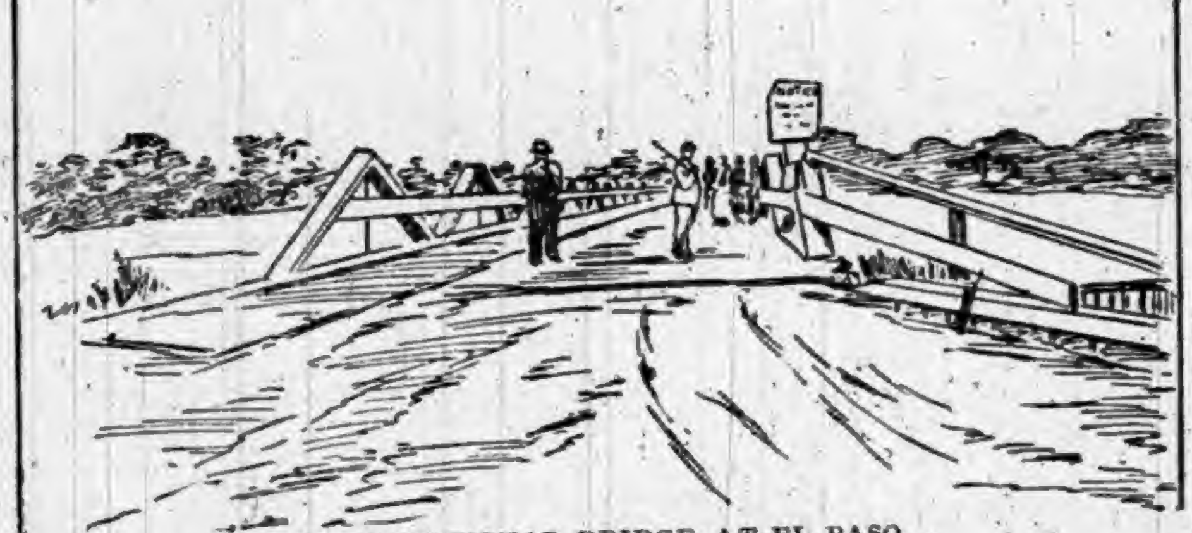
MEANS ADOPTED TO COLLECT TAXES ON IMPORTS.

Intricate System of Invoices, Affidavits and Official Papers—How Goods Are Shipped Through the Custom Houses—But Little Inspection of Land Frontiers.

Typical Custom Houses.

When a foreign vessel comes to this country it comes as an alien and a stranger. Its only rights are secured to it by treaty. Unless a ship seeking to land at one of our ports has its flag flying to denote its nationality, and unless it has its clearance papers from the foreign ports from which it sailed or can account for them, or, in short, unless the vessel can produce its passports and be properly introduced, it cannot be admitted to land and unload merchandise in the ports of this country. A foreign merchant desiring to ship goods to the United States must first go before the American Consul residing at the port from which he intends to ship the merchandise and make oath to the kind, quality and quantity of the articles he wishes to ship to the United States. This affidavit is called a "consular certificate" and is attached to the invoice of goods the merchant is going to export. Three of these invoices, properly certified, are made out, one of which is kept by the Consul, one sent to the Collector of the Port to which the goods are to be shipped and one given to the exporting merchant, who sends it to his customer in the United States. The invoice which goes to the Collector of the Port in this country is sent by the captain of the vessel which carries the freight listed in the invoice.

After the vessel crosses the ocean and is within fifteen leagues of the main shore it is possible that it may run across one of Uncle Sam's revenue cutters. If the ship is in the regular channel and making directly for port the revenue cutter will not molest it. But if the vessel is out of the beaten track, or has no colors flying, or if there is anything rakish or suspicious looking about it, the revenue cutter will signal it to "bring to," as coming to a halt is called in sailor parlance. To make this signal the revenue cutter runs up the revenue jack or fires a gun across the bows of the incoming vessel. When the vessel comes to a halt a boat is lowered from the cutter and two officers are sent aboard the ship to make an examination. If the captain can show his clearance and other ship papers, and they are found to be regular, he is permitted to go on, otherwise the vessel is placed under arrest and taken to the nearest port.

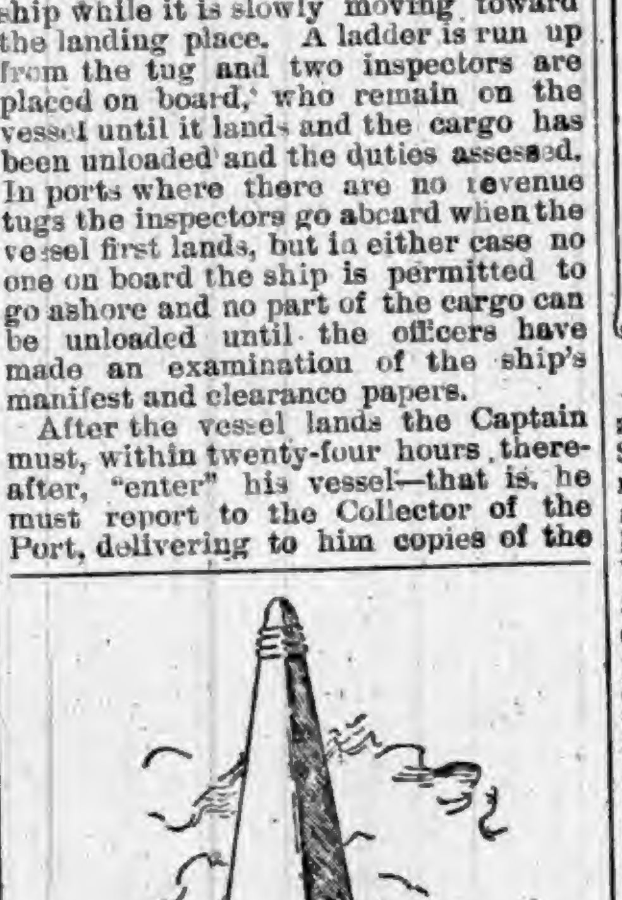


INTERNATIONAL BRIDGE AT EL PASO.

A Revenue Tug.

Having passed the revenue cutters, the vessel in some of the larger seaports meets a revenue tug just after entering the harbor. These little boats steam out to meet the big ship, and turning around run up alongside of the ship while it is slowly moving toward the landing place. A ladder is run up from the tug and two inspectors are placed on board, who remain on the vessel until it lands and the cargo has been unloaded and the duties assessed. In ports where there are no revenue tugs the inspectors go aboard when the vessel first lands, but in either case no one on board the ship is permitted to go ashore and no part of the cargo can be unloaded until the officers have made an examination of the ship's manifest and clearance papers.

After the vessel lands the Captain must, within twenty-four hours thereafter, "enter" his vessel—that is, he must report to the Collector of the Port, delivering to him copies of the manifest and clearance papers. To do this he first deposits his clearance papers with the Consul of the nation from which the ship sailed. The Consul examines the papers and if they are regular he gives the Captain of the vessel a certificate to this effect. The Captain then gives the Collector this certificate, which is official evidence that the vessel is from the country that it claims to be. Besides delivering his clearance papers to the Collector the Captain also delivers to him the manifest of his ship, containing a list of the passengers on board the vessel and the invoice of goods sent to the merchant in this country, which it will be remembered was indorsed by an American Consul in a foreign port before the goods were shipped to this country. The Captain must make oath that his manifest is in every way correct to the best of his knowledge and belief. When these regulations have been complied with the Collector issues an order for the delivery of the cargo.

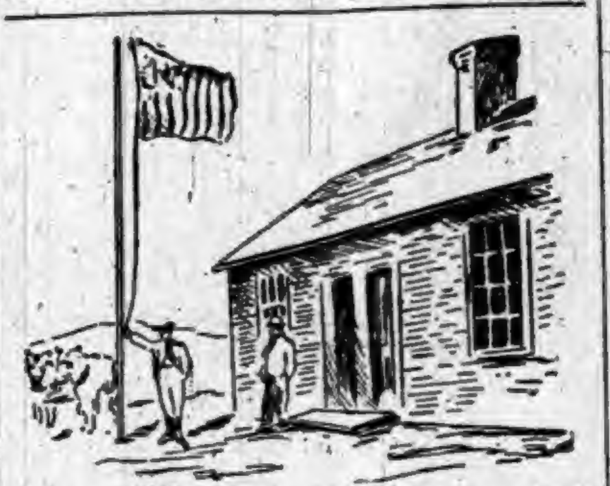


INITIAL MONUMENT MARKING MEXICAN BOUNDARY ON PACIFIC COAST

But before the importing merchant or consignee can secure his goods he must go before the Collector and secure a permit allowing him to unload his freight. To do this he goes to the Custom House and produces his invoices and bill of lading. The invoice is compared with the invoice in possession of the Collector and which was sent to him by the Consul residing in the country from which the goods were shipped. The bill of entry, which is presented by the importing merchant, is also compared with the bill of entry which the captain gives to the Collector at the same time that he does his manifest and clearance papers. These papers are then taken to the Naval Office, where the work is verified. When these papers are returned to the Custom House and found to be regular the Collector makes out what is known as an "estimate" of the amount of duties that should be paid. He also names a certain number of packages that must be sent to the public stores for appraisement in order that the rate of duty may be accurately ascertained.

After these formalities are through with the importer pays the estimated duty on the goods he wishes to transfer immediately to his store or ship to other merchants in the interior of the country. He may, if he wishes, get two permits, one allowing him to have immediate possession of the goods upon which he has paid a duty and the other to allow him to remove the goods on which the duty is not paid to a bonded warehouse

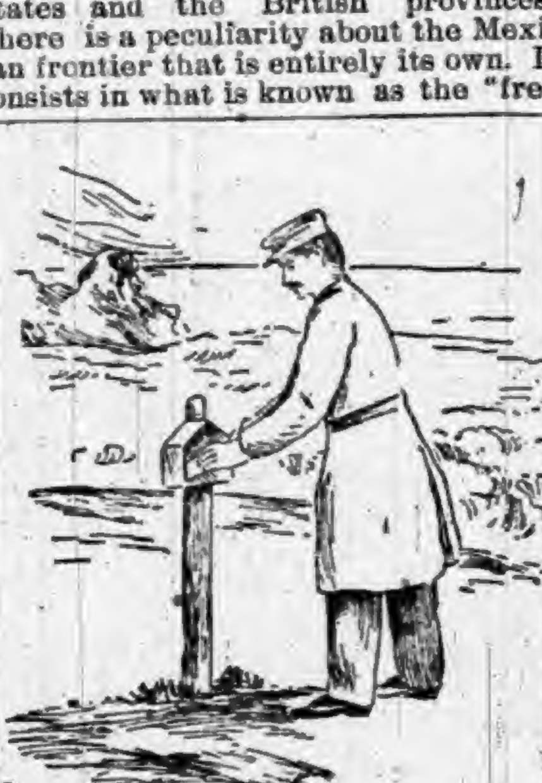
When a merchant imports a cargo of goods which he does not wish to place immediately upon the market, he can store his merchandise in a bonded warehouse by getting a permit to do so and by giving a bond to secure the payment of the duties. The bond is to the effect that if the merchandise be withdrawn within three years from the date of importation and the duties paid then, the bond is to be void. If merchandise is removed within a year after being placed in bond, then only the regular duties are imposed, but if it remains in bond longer than one year an extra charge of 10 per cent. upon the regular duty is added. All merchandise placed in a bonded warehouse must be withdrawn within three years or the goods will be sold to pay the duties.



FRONTIER CUSTOM HOUSE AT LOCHIEL, ARIZ.

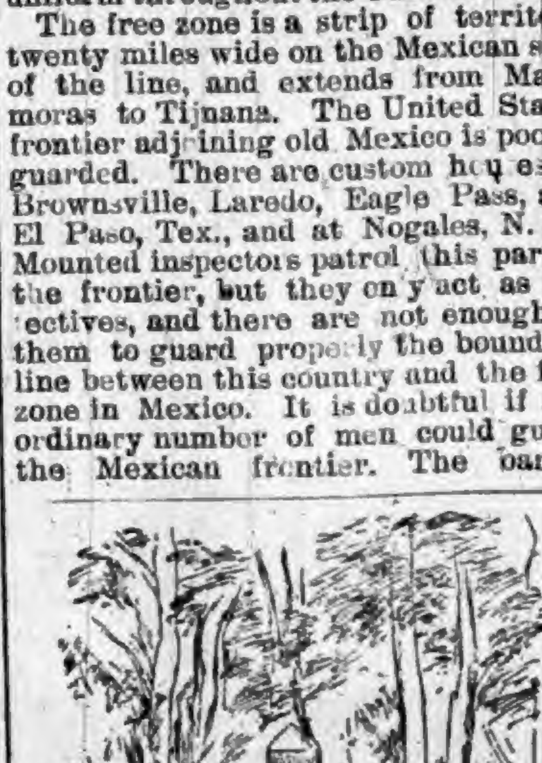
The Mexican "Free Zone."

At ports other than seaports the methods employed in collecting duties are the same as those just described, except, of course, that there are no revenue cutters or tugs. The manner of collecting the customs at some of the frontier custom houses is quite informal. This is especially true of the customs offices on the Mexican frontier and on the boundary line between the States and the British provinces. There is a peculiarity about the Mexican frontier that is entirely its own. It consists in what is known as the "free zone," and is situated in old Mexico. Several years ago the Mexican Government passed a law setting apart a narrow strip of territory on the boundary line between that country and the United States to be a "zona libra," or free zone, into which goods and merchandise could be shipped from any part of the world duty free. The object of this legislation was to build up a narrow strip of Mexican territory at the expense of the United States frontier. This piece of strategy by the Mexican Government is accomplishing its purpose, because the United States is debarred from retaliating with a similar law, for the reason that it would be contrary to the provision of the Constitution which declares that "all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."



POLICEMAN OF THE SHORE.

The free zone is a strip of territory twenty miles wide on the Mexican side of the line, and extends from Matamoras to Tijnana. The United States frontier adjoining old Mexico is poorly guarded. There are custom houses at Brownsville, Laredo, Eagle Pass, and El Paso, Tex., and at Nogales, N. M. Mounted inspectors patrol this part of the frontier, but they only act as detectives, and there are not enough of them to guard properly the boundary line between this country and the free zone in Mexico. It is doubtful if any ordinary number of men could guard the Mexican frontier. The barren plains in the northern part of Texas and in the southern part of New Mexico and Arizona afford great protection to the smugglers. Usually natural impediments make smuggling unprofitable. But it is the reverse in this instance. To the professional smuggler this sterile and wild tract of country is a bridge between Mexico and the inhabited part of the United States, which, if he can but safely cross, he feels that he is secure from pursuit and capture.



IRON POST ON THE CANADIAN LINE.

The Canadian Frontier.

The frontier between Canada and the United States is not patrolled in any manner. The only guards are the iron posts which stand like sentinels on the boundary line at a distance of one mile apart. These posts mark the line between the United States and Canada as settled by the Ashburton treaty in 1842. The custom houses are at the railroad stations on or near the line. Sometimes the custom house is three or four miles from the line. The collectors at these ports do not exert themselves very much in the way of guarding the frontier. In some instances they lend a helping hand to the smuggler. A collector of a small post on the New York frontier told the writer of a scheme he had devised to help the "boys" bring horses from Canada to the United States. He talked freely about the matter, and seemed to think that he owed these courtesies to the "boys" for having indorsed him for the office of collector.

Along the New York and Vermont frontier, every few miles, can be found what is known as the "line store." These stores are built on the boundary line, part of the store being in Canada and part in the United States. The chief object of these stores is to avoid the payment of the Government license required of retail dealers in liquor. Another object is to avoid the customs duties on such articles as are generally sold in country stores. They are closely watched, however, and not much is done in the way of evading customs duties. But as respects the avoidance of the Government license tax, the scheme is almost perfection itself. When the American customer comes to buy whisky he must go to the Canada side of the store, but when a Canadian wants his jug filled he must go over to the counter on the American side. Saturday afternoons and rainy days it is a common sight to see the lines of customers going and coming, one from Canada and the other from the United States. The proprietor escapes paying a tax in the United States for the reason that he does not sell liquor to a citizen of this country on American soil and the Government cannot bring a foreigner into this country as a witness.

The country along the northern boundary of New York and Vermont is not very thickly settled, and the people living there are are rather old-fashioned; yet, in a quiet and prosy way, there is a good deal of smuggling going on. It is a wonder that this part of the frontier is not better guarded. There are no police regulations whatever. The inspectors at the railway stations go to bed and to sleep at night, and the bars between Canada and the United States are left down, with no one to watch them. That the smugglers living along the line make the most of this opportunity is a matter of common notoriety in this part of the country.

BRIGANDS AND HIGHWAYMEN.

Better Police Protection in Rural Districts Needed.

Most Americans cherish the singular superstition that brigandage and highway robbery are only possible in depraved backward countries like Spain, Sicily or Greece, and that an English-speaking country with courts and the common law must necessarily be free from these pests.

This is nonsense. Brigands, footpads and highwaymen will spring up in any land where an efficient police is absent. They swarmed over England a century and a half ago, they were frequent in France a little earlier, and they were to be found over most of Europe in the last century. They are certain to appear in this country and become a wide-spread pest unless there is a radical change in the American habit of keeping the people's peace.

At present, it is left to keep itself. Great tracts of this country are left without any protection to travel, except the sheriff and the constable. City people have very little idea of the insecurity which exists in many American rural districts. There are many counties in New York State, and some doubtless in this State, where it would not be considered prudent for an unattended woman to walk in broad day along a lonely country road. The farms on which farmers are in constant fear of tramps can be numbered by the thousand. While abroad, even in countries like Spain and Italy, the rural districts are given the benefit of a police patrol paid for by taxes or by the wealth and trade of the cities, here our thinly settled farming neighborhoods are left to protect themselves as best they can.

The wonder is, not that a train is now and then held up, but that this does not happen a great deal oftener. Depend upon it, these modern highway robberies in the shape of train robberies will go on increasing until our States establish a permanent rural police.—Philadelphia Press.

Senseless Display.

When diamond aigrets are used as bonnet pins and gemmed and enameled watches are flimsily and ostentatiously fastened on bodices, it is not strange that thieves should find occupation among the tens of thousands that flock to the Fair daily. If good taste—that necessarily revolts against a needless display of costly ornaments in such places—will not induce women to leave jewels at home and to wear watches less obtrusively, conscience ought to have some weight with them. Many a thief has been made so by opportunity. It is tempting the weak to carry expensive gems where a little stratagem is all that is required to seize and conceal them. It is putting a premium on dishonesty to parade bijouterie in a manner to make employment of detectives necessary, where simplicity of dress would be at once more dignified and less dangerous.—Chicago Herald.

Mourning.

The English period of mourning for a father-in-law is twelve months, ten months black, two months half mourning; crape is seldom worn, although the crape period was formerly six months. For a parent the period is the same as above. The longest period for a brother is six months, five months black, one month half-mourning. The crape period was formerly three months; it is now almost discarded. The shortest period is four months black, no half mourning. We may remark that the period of mourning for a father-in-law is often shortened to six months when relatives reside at a considerable distance from each other.

THAT the hospitality of our country is greatly abused is shown by the figures in our last census. Almost fifty-seven per cent. of the white persons in prisons and penitentiaries are foreign born.

WHAT A MINISTER SAYS OF SWAMP-ROOT.

Sageville, N. Y. May 12, 1893.

Gentlemen:—For years I suffered with kidney and liver trouble. Doctor after doctor treated me with no avail. I grew worse and was in despair of ever being any better. What agony I endured when the attacks came on, rolling on the floor, screaming and half crazy! Nothing but morphine would quiet me. It seemed death would be a relief from my suffering. My stomach was in a terrible condition, food, what little I ate, distressed me, my complexion was yellow; bowels constipated; I was only able to walk as far as the front porch. A friend recommended your Swamp-Root. I began to take it at once.

KENNEDY'S MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

DONALD KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, MASS.,

Has discovered in one of our common pasture weeds a remedy that cures every kind of Humor, from the worst Scrofula down to a common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder humor). He has now in his possession over two hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

When the lungs are affected it causes shooting pains, like needles passing through them; the same with the Liver or Bowels. This is caused by the ducts being stopped, and always disappears in a week after taking it.

If the stomach is foul or bilious it will cause squeamish feelings at first.

No change of diet ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it. Dose, one tablespoonful in water at bedtime. Read the Label. Send for Book.

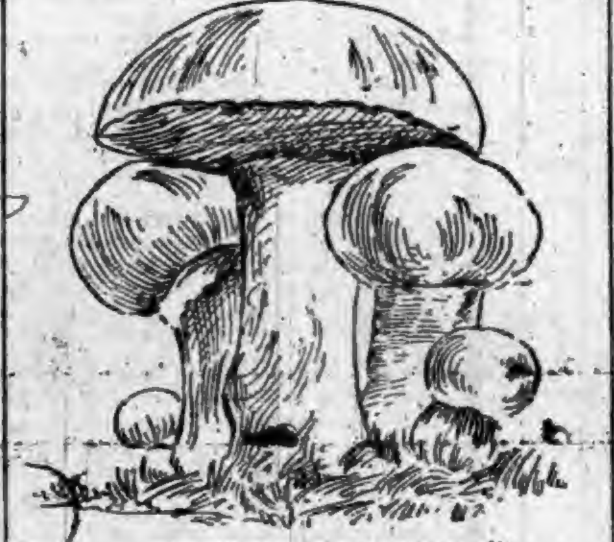
BETTER NOT EAT 'EM.

THE OLD TOADSTOOL TEST IS OUT OF FAVOR.

There Are So Many Varieties of These Fungi that Picking by Amateurs Should Be Discouraged—The Common Mushroom—Beware of the Deadly Toadstool!

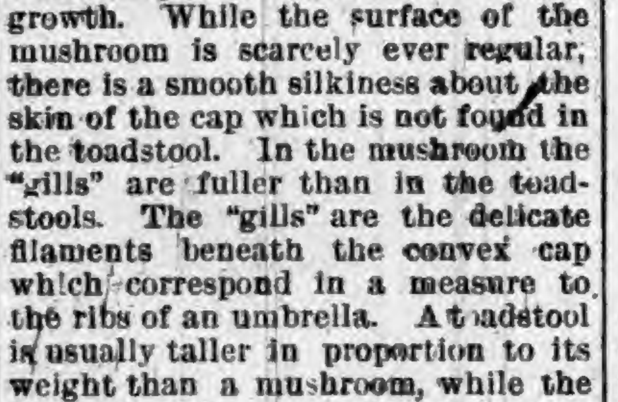
How to Know a Mushroom.

So numerous have been the fatalities of late from eating poisonous toadstools under the impression that they were genuine mushrooms, that it becomes a matter of the greatest consequence to have a correct understanding as to the difference between the healthful and the dangerous article. There are in this country about 120 different varieties of fungi, and it is safe to assert that over 100 varieties are either unhealthful or positively poisonous. It is extremely difficult to tell the difference, and even experienced farmers and dealers are at times deceived. There are, however, a few classes of mushrooms about which there can be no mistake, and the only safe rule is to touch no fungi outside these well-known varieties. It may be generally stated, however, that the mushroom has an agreeable odor and taste, while the toadstool is acrid to the palate, and gives out a heavy scent that is far from pleasant.



DELICIOUS MUSHROOMS.

The genuine mushroom is plumper, rounder and softer than the toadstool. The latter, although at times very large, has the appearance of what might be termed a hungry growth. While the surface of the mushroom is scarcely ever regular, there is a smooth silkiness about the skin of the cap which is not found in the toadstool. In the mushroom the "gills" are fuller than in the toadstools. The "gills" are the delicate filaments beneath the convex cap which correspond in a measure to the ribs of an umbrella. A toadstool is usually taller in proportion to its weight than a mushroom, while the stem is thinner, darker and more wiry. Pink gills mark the best-known species of mushrooms, but there are toadstools, too, that have pink gills, although the tint is not quite so delicate.

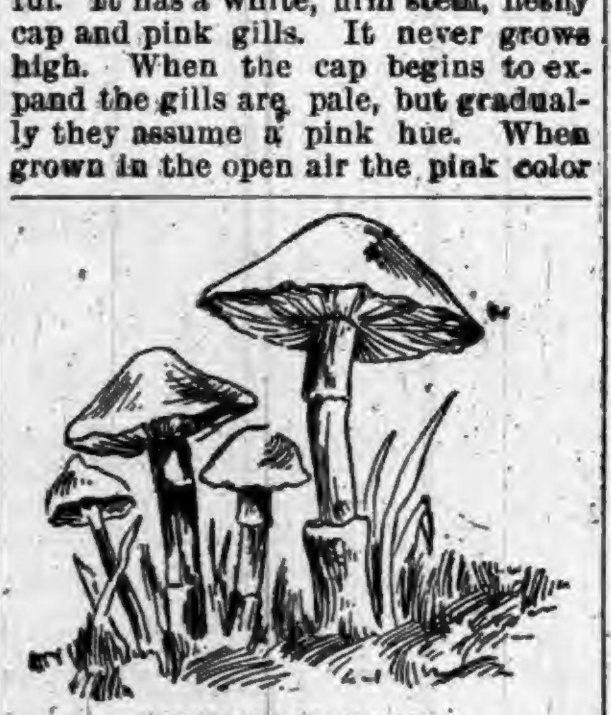


HORSE MUSHROOMS.

The toadstool can usually be detected under the influence of salt, which brings out the evil flavor and makes the taste more bitter. The fungus should be placed cap down and the salt inserted in the gills. Some farmers say silver is a sure test, but this is doubtful. The plan is to place a silver spoon or coin in the stew, and if it becomes tarnished the fungi are pronounced toadstools. If the silver retains its bright color they are declared to be mushrooms. There are healthy mushrooms in which the gills are purple, rust colored and black, but it is not safe for a novice to experiment with them.

The Common Mushroom.

There can be no mistake about the common mushroom, as the most plentiful variety is termed. It is the principal one of the three or four species that are cultivated. The common mushroom has a fine flavor, and is nutricious and highly healthful. It has a white, firm stem, fleshy cap and pink gills. It never grows high. When the cap begins to expand the gills are pale, but gradually they assume a pink hue. When grown in the open air the pink color begins to show itself the moment the sun strikes. This is the best time to pluck them. When they grow older the gills assume a chocolate color and the flavor deteriorates. Later on the gills turn black, and then they are unfit for food. There is a suggestion of a delicate fleshy taste in the common mushroom when cooked fresh.



POISONOUS TOADSTOOLS.

Another healthy variety is known as the horse mushroom, from its great size. The horse mushroom has a big hollow stem, with a broad, pendulous ring just below the gills and a slightly conical cap. The gills are a brownish white, and never the delicate tint of the common mushroom.

France Supplies New York.

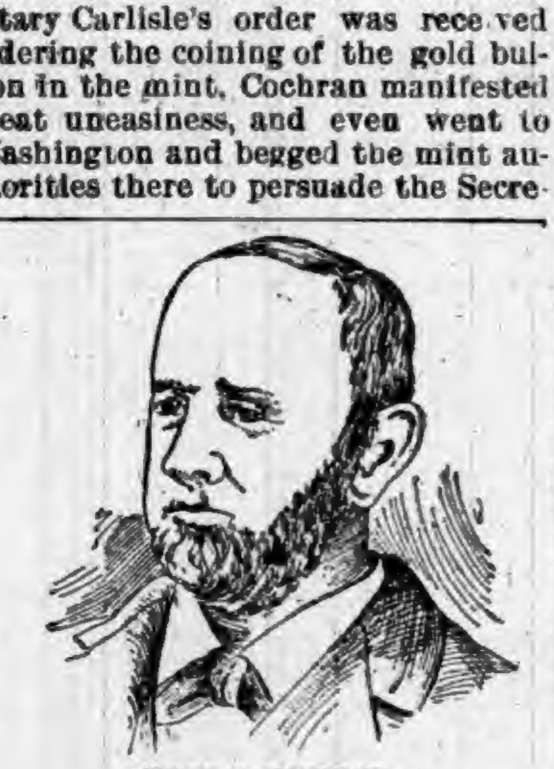
Although the varieties of fungi are numbered by the hundred, only those mentioned stand in sufficiently high estimate to receive the attention of cultivators, and the common mushroom takes first place. Mushrooms are cultivated in caves kept at a temperature ranging from 60 to 70 degrees, and they require no sunlight. In recent years several such caves have been built by rich Americans to supply their private tables. Jay Gould had one at Irvington, and so had Cyrus W. Field, and Levi P. Morton now maintains one at Rhinecliff. In these caves the mushrooms are grown all the year round. There need be no alarm about mushrooms secured at respectable restaurants, for they are all imported from Paris in sealed tin cases. All are cultivated, and none of the wild varieties are handled. Outside the walls of Paris there are over twenty miles of mushroom caves, and the Paris market is supplied daily with 3,000 pounds of cultivated mushrooms.

HE ROBBED THE MINT.

Henry S. Cochran, Who Stole Over $100,000 from the Government.

Henry S. Cochran, who confessed that he stole over $100,000 worth of gold bullion from the government, has for forty years been employed as Weighing Clerk in the Philadelphia Mint. The vault from which the bullion was extracted was sealed in 1878, and not until it was opened recently was the theft discovered.

Ever since the vault was sealed Mr. Cochran has been engaged in taking the gold. By means of a crooked wire he pulled the bullion bars from the top of a pile where they were placed crosswise like railroad ties. When they fell on the floor he would, by means of his hook, pull the bars to the iron latticed door, the bottom of which was a little loose on one side. As the gold bars only weigh from twelve to fifteen pounds each, he could carry them home secreted in his lunch basket. His later stealings Mr. Cochran hid in a ventilator loft of the mint, and here the gold was discovered after his confession. Some of the gold he sent to himself at the mint by express, and when it arrived he had it coined. When Secretary Carlisle's order was received ordering the coining of the gold bullion in the mint, Cochran manifested great uneasiness, and even went to Washington and begged the mint authorities there to persuade the Secretary to countermand his order. This, they told him, was impossible, and Mr. Cochran returned home. Suspicion was aroused by Mr. Cochran's course of action and a detective was sent to Philadelphia from Washington. To him Mr. Cochran confessed his crime; $134,093.40 is the exact value of the bullion taken.



HENRY S. COCHRAN.

Fortune in the Field.

Recent experiments point to the growth of a new and profitable industry from the prolific scrub growth of the Florida forests and fields. It has been proved that the leaf of the saw palmetto can be ground into a pulp which makes an excellent article of hollow-ware for domestic and other uses, and the present experiments are expected to prove the adaptability of this material to the making of all kinds of paper. For some time past the peculiar cabbage-like substance in the top of the cabbage palmetto has been used with the tender tops as well, as a fiber in the manufacture of parchment. It is now proposed to obtain cheap paper fiber from the ordinary scrub plant. Some of this pulp has been successfully worked up into pails, tubs, basins and other hollow-ware. The supply of saw palmetto is practically inexhaustible in Florida. Millions of acres are covered with it, and when cut down to the ground it grows up again two or three times a year. A crop that grows without cultivation and in such very large quantities bids fair to have "millions in it."

Anecdotes of the Duke of Edinburgh

The succession of the Duke of Edinburgh to a ducal throne on the continent has set the papers to telling stories about him. One is, that when commanding the Galatea he called in plain clothes on an admiral, who rebuked him with the stiff greeting: "I should have been very happy to receive your royal highness on any other occasion, but unhappily at this moment I am expecting a visit from the captain of the Galatea." The duke went back to his ship and put on his uniform. Another story is, that when traveling in Canada he had a guide who had served his brother, and who remarked one day: "The Prince of Wales gave me a splendid gold watch, sir." "Indeed!" said the duke, "that's more than he ever did for me."

Elixir of Youthful Spirits.

"As I was walking up and down my room the other day," said a man, "wrapped in thought and absorbed in care, with head lowered and hands clasped behind me, I heard a titter ing, and looking back I saw my children following me, each with bowed head and clasped hands; they had tried hard to be very solemn, but had found it quite impossible. I could not help laughing myself when I saw them; but I picked up my burden and marched on. Promptly the children fell in again and marched after me; when I turned a corner I saw them tagging on as before. We all laughed again, and then the children and I played soldier for a while. When we got through with that I found that my serious friend care had gone away."—New York Sun.

Milk for Burns.

A French physician has obtained good results in dressing burns with milk. Compresses are soaked with milk and laid on the burn, to be renewed night and morning. An extensive burn on the leg was healed in this manner. Two days reduced it in size from 14 to 7 centimeters; at the end of three days it measured but 2½ centimeters in diameter. Another burn which had been treated for eight days with olive oil and oxide of zinc healed rapidly under a simple milk dressing.

A Fisherman's Baby.

The big billows rock him as mamma rocks thee.
He hastes to his dear ones o'er billows of foam;

HUSH, LITTLE BABY.

Then sleep, little darling, till papa comes home.
Sleep, little baby; hush, little baby!
Papa is coming, no longer to roam.

The shells and the pebbles, all day tossed about,
Are lulled into sleep by the tide ebbing out.
The tired shore slumbers, stretched out in the sand,
While the waves hurry off at mid-ocean's command.
Then hush, little darling; sleep, little darling;
Sleep, baby, rocked by thy mother's own hand.

The winds that have rollicked all day in the west
Are hushed into sleep on the calm evening's breast.
The boats that were out with the wild sea at play
Are now rocked to sleep in the arms of the bay.
Then rest, little baby; sleep, little baby;

Sleep, little darling; too soon thou wilt be
A man like thy father, to sail o'er the sea.
Then sleep will not come at thy bidding or prayer.

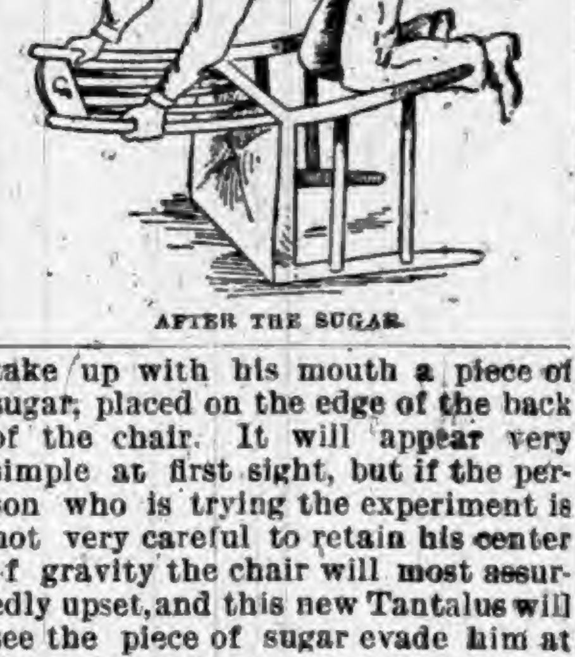
WITH THE WILD SEA AT PLAY.

For thou wilt be harassed by danger and care.
Then sleep, little darling; rest, little baby;
Rest whilst thou may, dear, and sleep whilst thou dare.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

A Good Trick to Try.

Place a chair on the floor, and ask someone to kneel on it in the position indicated in the drawing, and to take up with his mouth a piece of sugar, placed on the edge of the back of the chair. It will appear very simple at first sight, but if the person who is trying the experiment is not very careful to retain his center of gravity the chair will most assuredly upset, and this new Tantalus will see the piece of sugar evade him at the minute he expects to take it between his lips.



AFTER THE SUGAR.

Elsie's First Day at School.

Elsie was very fond of looking at pictures, and mamma would tell her what they meant. Then the little girl would repeat the story which belonged to each picture, and sometimes would make up a little story of her own.

"I can't read if there isn't any picture," she would say, when a book without illustrations was shown her.

A few days before she was 5 years old papa bought her a primer, and there was one picture in it which she thought very funny. It was a dog holding a pig by the ear. She asked papa to read her what was printed about it. In a short time she could repeat it word for word, and would say in her droll way, "Wag-has-the-pig-by-the-ear. Go-'way, Wag!"

A few days after her fifth birthday she begged so hard to go to school that finally mamma said she might go with Mary and Ellen, two big girls who lived across the street. Elsie was wildly happy and could hardly wait for mamma to brush her hair and put on a clean white apron.

Elsie had a dear little chair to sit in, with a truly desk in front, and thought she never had such a good time in her life.

After a while the pretty teacher, whose name was Miss Tucker, called Elsie out with a class of little folks about her size. After some of the others had read, she opened Elsie's book and asked her if she could read.

Now Elsie was a little bit frightened, with so many bright eyes watching her, but Miss Tucker happened to open the book at the picture of "Wag and the Pig," and when Elsie saw that she was brave all at once. She repeated the page very fast, and really thought she was reading it.

Then Miss Tucker said, "Why, you read so well, I must put you in the first class." Then Elsie was very proud. But a little later when she took her place with the higher class and was asked to read in another place in the book she said, "Oh, I don't know that. I haven't learned any story 'cept 'Wag and the Pig,' yet!" She couldn't understand why Ellen and Mary laughed.

Miss Tucker smiled just a little, but said very kindly, "Never mind, dear, you will know all the stories before long." And she did, and could read them, too.

His Mistake.

She was a tall and stately young woman, but the face beneath her light hair had been browned and reddened until she rivaled an aboriginal American. She spoke excitedly to the drug store clerk and to the friend who accompanied her.

"I've used benzoin and I've tried lemon, and Mrs. So-and-So's lotion and Mrs. Blank's ointment, and I'm just as much like Choctaw as ever. Oh, Madge, I know there's nothing to do. I'll never regain my normal hue before November. But this year I must."

Then to the clerk: "Bring me acids, poisons—anything!" Then to her friend: "Don't you see how it is? I've got to be married this month, and I don't want to look like a rare old bronze dressed in satin and tulle. If only—if only Ed had proposed in time for me to get my complexion in shape for the wedding!"—New York World.

A Very Curious Experiment.

The French are nothing if not ingenious. On July 31 a novel experiment was tried in Paris. Five balloons were sent up from the Esplanade des Invalides, and the aeronauts in charge of them were instructed to descend within an hour as close as possible to Combs la Ville, after passing over a radius of thirty kilometres supposed to be occupied by an enemy. After the balloons were sent up a number of cyclists left the Esplanade with instructions to pursue and capture any of the five balloons that failed to cross the zone of investment. Three of the aeronauts succeeded in their purpose, while the other two balloons fell within the radius and were immediately captured by the cyclists, thus demonstrating how useful the latter would be in actual warfare.

Information From the Slot.

"A year or so ago," said a young man to a Pittsburgher, "I spent a few weeks in New Orleans. One day I saw a machine which bore the inscription: 'Drop a nickel in the slot and learn how to make your pants last.' As I hadn't a great deal of money I thought an investment of 5 cents to show me how to save the purchase of a pair of trousers would be small capital put to good use, so I dropped a nickel in and a card appeared. What do you suppose it recommended as the way to make your pants last?"

"Don't wear 'em, I suppose."

"No."

"What did it say?"

"Make your coat and vest first."—Pittsburg Chronicle.

A Boundary.

Legal gentlemen who have to "search for title" in the interests of their clients occasionally find in a queerly worded old deed a ray of amusement to lighten their tedious task.

In a deed of land in Lexington, Massachusetts, which bears the date 1786 and was recorded in the Registry at Cambridge, one line of the boundary is described as running to "a stump and stones where Daniel Harrington licked William Smith."

Whether the stones were placed around the stump as a monument of the "licking" or of boundary lines is not set forth in this old document.

Particular About Their Names.

As a general rule it annoys a celebrity to be "called out of his name." Charles Reade used to bitterly complain that his most passionate admirers often gave him one letter too little, and that "harbitrary gent," John Forster, expressed himself still more strongly to the same effect. Mr. Du Maurier, when one of his devotees addressed him as De Maurier, is said, with equal wit and good-nature to have adjured him to "give the devil his Du."

Such Is Fame.

It is not of Earl Beauchamp, whose coming of age was celebrated quite recently, but of his father that this story was told two or three years ago. At one of the well known hotels in Paris, the late Earl was addressed by a friend as "Beauchamp." Whereupon a young lady who over heard the word, asked: "Are you the gentleman whose pills are advertised everywhere?"

Pawnbroker to His Majesty.

In traveling about England one is much impressed with the pride of tradesmen who have had the good fortune to cater in some way to the needs of the throne. Gaudy signs greet the eye at nearly ever turn upon which one reads that the tradesman there engaged in business is "Cloakmaker by Special Appointment to Her Majesty the Queen," another is "Purveyor of Anchovy Paste H. R. H. the Prince of Wales," and so on. Among all these it is noticed that plumbers and gas fitters are conspicuous by their absence, but if an English newspaper tells the truth—and why should it not in this case?—there was at one time in England a sign that was delicious in the extreme. It read, "By Special Appointment Pawnbroker to His Majesty."

The World's Fair!

Take it all in all the world is fair. That is, its judgments are pretty generally just. No doubt it has formed many incorrect conclusions from the time the caravels of Columbus appeared off the shores of San Salvador to the present year of celebration, but there are instances of its fairness which can be cited unquestioned. It has, after comparative tests, given its award to Hostetter's Stomach Bitters for efficacy in cases of malarial, rheumatic and kidney disorder, dyspepsia, liver complaint, constipation, nervousness and debility. Among "positive facts without any doubt" this verdict deserves a prominent place. The experience of a generation justifies and the concurrent testimony of hosts of eminent physician bears out its truth. Give the Bitters a fair trial and verify it.

His Definition.

"What causes the greatest number of fires in dwelling houses, according to your experience?" asked a person of an inquiring turn of mind of an insurance adjuster.

"Friction causes about as many as anything else," replied the insurance adjuster.

"Friction?" repeated the other.

"Yes, friction," returned the insurance adjuster. "But perhaps not what you're accustomed to call friction. What I mean is the result of rubbing a thousand-dollar policy on a six-hundred-dollar house."

A Queer River.

The Tinto River, in Spain, possesses remarkable qualities. Its waters are yellow as the topaz, harden the sand and petrify it in a most surprising manner. If a stone falls into the river and rests upon another they both become perfectly united and conglutinated in a year. No fish live in its stream.

A Doctor With Experience.

One day while mending the roof of his house Chodja lost his balance and, falling to the ground, broke a rib. A friend of his went hurridly for a Hakim, (doctor.) "Hakim, have you ever fallen from a roof and broken a rib?" was the first question Chodja asked the doctor. "Thank God, no," replied the Hakim. "Then go away at once, please," cried Chodja; I want a doctor who has fallen from a roof and knows what it is!"—Good Words.

Hood's Sarsaparilla Cures

"For years rheumatism, neuralgia and heart disease caused me such excruciating pains that I could hardly endure them. Doctors' medicine failed to give me relief. The palpitation of my heart was so severe at times it would seem as if I was going to die. I was growing worse when I commenced to take Hood's Sarsaparilla. It relieved me, and afterwards when I felt a bad spell coming I always took a dose of the medicine and it shortly cured me. I am 67 years of age and can truly say in my declining years that has done more for me than all other medicines."

WATERLOO.

Thursday, a good crowd attended the fair.

Mrs. Phil Plum has friends from Bryan visiting her.

Mr. and Mrs. Keep have returned from Chicago. Mrs. Keep is sick with asthma.

U. B. quarterly meeting at Pleasant Hill, Smithfield, next Saturday and Sunday.

Jonathan Crays, who resides near Summit, has been back on a visit in the old neighborhood. His home is in Kansas.

Mr. and Mrs. Bowlby, Mrs. Dursh and daughter returned Tuesday from Corunna, where they have been to visit Mrs. Zwilling and daughter.

Mrs. Reed is much encouraged about herself. She thinks she is certainly improving in health and gaining in flesh under her late treatment.

The 88th had their reunion here yesterday, including a fine dinner, speeches and a good time generally. In the evening there was a camp fire.

The display of fruit at the fair was better than would have been expected this year. There were 202 plates of fruit and 362 samples of canned fruit, preserves, jelly, etc.

Wednesday evening at the opera house the comedy drama entitled "Man and Master," was played before a good audience. Thursday evening the play was East Lynn.

Many fears were felt for the safety of Charlie Speer on the lakes during the recent storms, but it was learned on Tuesday that his boat was safe at Sault Ste Marie, Michigan.

Henry Shimp, known as Cully Shimp when he was a young man, living here, has been visiting his friends and relatives here for a time. He is in the real estate business at Colorado Springs.

Mrs. Alonzo Fawcett, Marion Bemenderfer and wife, Misses Kittie and Nellie Koons and others who went on the excursion train Oct. 3, returned the 12th in time to attend the fair here Friday.

The display of vegetables at the fair was above the average. The same may be said of stock. There were plenty of fine flowers, especially those of Mrs Dickinson. The races Thursday were the fastest ever seen on the grounds.

Mrs. and Mrs. Phil. Morell returned from Chicago sooner than they would on account of Mrs. M's health. She got caught in the rain, and with the change of weather took a very severe cold that made her sick. She is yet looking very badly.

Mrs. Dursh and daughter, from Wisconsin, are visiting with her brother, Mr. Bowlby. The brother and sister have not met before in thirty-five years and will no doubt thoroughly enjoy the week alotted for their visit. The ladies go from here to Toledo and other places in Ohio to visit other brothers and sisters.

Mrs. Huber, the mother of our townsman George Huber, came from Michigan last Friday for a short visit with her children here. Monday her son went with her to Ft. Wayne and saw her on her way to visit another son in Ohio, with whom she will spend the winter. Mrs. Huber, sr., is a widow and will hereafter have a home with her children.

Work was commenced this week on the well on the corner of Wayne and Railroad streets that has caused heretofore such an immensity of trouble, labor and expense. Two windmills have been bought, used and abandoned. Now although the present well was bored and over fifty feet in depth, yet it was thought surface water in some way got into the well, so now the boring is continued to prevent that.

Friday evening, after the fair was over, the rain commenced and continued all night and more or less on Saturday. The wind was high, also, and the weather became very cold. Sunday morning there was some rain, but finally the weather became pleasant. Monday and Tuesday nights we had heavy frosts that cut down everything not before stricken, and a coat of ice covered any water left in pails out of doors, and even where partly under cover.

Quite a natural curiosity was on exhibition at the fair grounds and also on our streets Monday of this week. A colored woman, who was quite black, had a daughter ten years of age, who, while not white, was far from black, being tawny in color; but the strange thing was, that instead of hair, or the curly hair peculiar to the race, her head was covered with vertible wool like that on sheep, and white also. The mother stated that her child's hair was sheared once a year precisely as sheep are sheared.

The writer has received from Armour & Co, of Chicago, one of their recipe books showing the many nice ways in which the buillion prepared by him may be used. The various soup and inviting dishes that may be so quickly prepared. Also with the book came a circular telling what vegetole is. It is made from cottonseed oil and choice beef suet, for all shortening purposes, using only two-thirds as much as lard or butter, costing less and claiming that more satisfactory results are obtained. The following questions are answered: What is it? Who uses it? Why they use it? How to use it—for frying, etc.

The following incident came under the observation of a world's fair visitor. A girl accompanied by a tall, ungainly sort of man stopped before "Milan's Angelus" The girl who evidently had some inspirations and seemed of a finer mind and make than her escort, said, "James, what does it represent?" He at once replied, "She is asking him where he got that hat." This must have jarred terribly on the nerves of those around who appreciated the feast they were enjoying, and some no doubt thought "O wud some power the giftie gie us, to see oursels as ithers see us." While others of different make and seeing James' self satisfaction, perhaps thought "Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise."

BUTLER.

Quite a number of Butler people will yet attend the great fair.

The Thomas Revett trial called a good many Butler people to Auburn.

Mrs. Fred Froelich and son, of Garrett, visited over Sunday, with T. C. Fralick.

The bicycle works are as busy as ever, and indications point to a successful enterprise.

Mrs. Geo. Kebrer has sold her drug store to a gentleman from Iowa, and will retire from business.

The Basket Factory will start up immediately, and when in operation it will employ a large number of hands.

M. F. Campbell has formed a partnership with one of Garrett's leading business men in the insurance business'

Geo. Haskins has fitted up a small room in his building and opened a bakery. this makes three bakeries in town.

Our schools are prospering very satisfactorily, the number in attendance being slightly below that of last year.

Hartsell Wanamaker, an old resident of Butler, who has been ill for a number of weeks, will go to Detroit and live with his daughter.

Geo. Stoner, one of our enterprising young druggists, will move to Ashley and will enter into partnership with his father in the drug business.

Dr. Carpenter is suffering from a burned hand. He received the injury while discharging fire works on the second night of the late, and much much talked of, street fair.

The Standard Accident Insurance Co, of Detroit, through M. F. Campbell, its agent here, paid Thomas Rudes $105 60 last Saturday, to cover his loss of time caused from a fall from a horse last July.

ST JOE.

Meritt Barney drove over to Hicksville Sunday afternoon.

Mrs. Neri Lozier, of Ashley, visited with Stephen Likens last week.

Superintendent of schools, C. M. Merica, attended the institute Saturday.

Warren Coburn and family, of Edgerton, Ohio, visited with the family of John Williams.

Chris. Curie has about recovered from his contact with his horse's foot and says he wants no more of that kind of medicine.

Simon Nichols, wife and daughters, Mrs. C. J. Yarnelle, S. L. Widney and wife, Walter, G. Culbertson and Sell Bowen are at the world's fair.

William Leighty, wife and daughter, Mrs. M. F, Body and daughter, Clarence Woodcox and Miss Belle Filley attended the Waterloo fair last Thursday.

Among the arrivals home from the White City the past few days we notice Wm. Simonton and wife, B. A. Woodcox and wife, H. W. Bowman and wife, Mrs. Frank Barney, Sol. Barney and wife, Mrs. J. R. Culbertson, Mrs. Jake Sechler and Marsh Andress and wife.

The St. Joe schools, with Prof. Bonnell at the helm, are progressing finely. All the departments are under the charge of old teachers that insure success. C A. Woodcox has charge of the Grammar department; Miss Emma Curie, Intermediate, and Miss Addie Widney, Primary.

Hagart, the Bazaar man, moved to Defiance the fore part of this week. He came here one year ago and opened out a notion store which he run a few months and then sold to Mrs. Ida Andress, since then he has been acting as a collection agent for the proprietor of the St. Joe News.

Owing to the fact that Uncle Jim still holds on to the St. Joe P. O, Mahlon has been working in the elevator for the Barney Bros. If Jim never intends to give it up, we don't see why he don't say so and set the minds of the faithful at rest. Mahlon says he thinks Jim might let him have it now, for he knows the republicans won't let him keep it if they succeed three years hence, and we guess that's about right, too.

HELMER.

The new barn of Judd Shade is being painted, which adds greatly to its appearance.

Homer Glosson has moved on South Main street where he will start a first-class barber shop.

Mr. Douglas started his saw mill last Tuesday, and Mr. Norton will start next Monday with a fine lot of logs.

Miss Ella Bodenhafer, of Kendallville, is the guest of Miss Jennie Shade during the absence of her mother, who is in Ohio visiting relatives.

Our weighmaster, Mr. Barker, reports from 400 to 1,000 bushels of wheat coming in daily. What is the matter of Helmer as a wheat center?

We see in the columns of the Ashley Times that twenty-seven visitors for the fair left from there and Hudson last Tuesday. Forty-seven left from Helmer the same day and twenty the next.

Lists of Patents.

Court.

The trial of Revett for the killing of Warner Blackwell near Butler took the time last week and into this. The facts brought out we have told often, but were briefly these: Blackwell, a well-to do farmer living just south of Butler was in the habit of coming to town and getting drunk, when he would be quarrelsome and abusive. He had been fined several times, but on this occasion refused to be arrested, swearing he would pay no more fines. Justice J. McNabb, of that place, issued a warrant to the constable, G. H. McNabb, and sent him out to Blackwell's house to get him. Blackwell refused to come and being still drunk, was in an ugly mood. Charles Fanning who went out with McNabb staid at Blackwell's while McNabb went back for more help. The two men passed the time in a friendly way for a time and then Blackwell went to the barn to do the evening chores, or to see to the stock. But he took a revolver with him and when he saw McNabb and his new men coming he came out and ordered them away swearing he would not be arrested. Revett was with the men who came to the barn. Blackwell started to go to the house, but the men tried to persuade him to go with them peaceably, when he again ordered them away. He was backing towards the house revolver in hand while the men were following, though the quarreling seemed to be between him and Revett. The latter seemed to annoy Blackwell most, and he turned to him and fired at him with his revolver, but missed him. Revett returned the fire with a large navy revolver he had and which he carried a great deal as night watchman in Butler. He, too, missed, or as he said in his testimony, fired into the air, Blackwell retreated on a run to the house and went in. He soon after came out onto the front porch and sat down on a tool chest. This time he had a double barrel shot gun and again swore he would shoot if they didn't go away for he would not be taken. He still seemed to pay most attention to Revett who was in front of him. He finally came out towards the men still threatening and ordering them off. Revett was directly in front of him, Mr Tyson being on one side of Revett and Charles Fanning on the other, while constable McNabb was rather behind Blackwell. In the quarrel Blackwell finally cocked both barrels and pointed at Tyson. Revett called to him not to shoot, saying "We only want you to go with us," or something to that effect. Blackwell then turned on Revett and when the gun was a few inches from his body, he snapped it, the cap failing to explode. Revett tried to fire his revolver, but had not cocked it as at the moment he was under the impression that it was his self-cocking revolver, a weapon he had given to Constable McNabb when they started from town Blackwell snapped the same barrel again, but of course with no effect, when Revett who had now cocked his revolver, shot him in the body near the heart, and Blackwell fell, dropping his gun. He rose to a sitting position and swore at Revett saying "You have killed me," fell over dead. There was an inquest by the coroner, and later the widow had the matter brought before the authorities and this grand jury indicted Revett for the killing. J. E. Rose & J. H. Rose and E. D. Hartman defended Revett, making the points that he was acting under orders of officers of the law, and also in self defense as Blackwell shot at him. The prosecution, it being a state case, was in the hands of Prosecutor Butler, though the trial was conducted by Judge McClellan and A. J. Baxter. They proceeded on the theory that the circumstances did not justify the killing, that the offense Blackwell was to be arrested for was not a serious one, and the officers could have waited till Blackwell was sober—that they used undue haste and did not use the prudence and judgment which if properly exercised would have avoided bloodshed—that Revett was not the proper man to put to do the work as it was claimed there was ill-feeling between him and Blackwell, as the latter had killed Revett's dog. They also claimed that with four men all armed surrounding Blackwell, he could have been captured without firing a shot. As predicted in the COURIER, the fight between the attorneys was a hot one, for there were strong points to argue on and a great variety of witnesses. Saturday forenoon Revett was put on the stand and swore to many of the things we have stated. At 2 p. m. court adjourned till Monday.

The case was concluded Monday and the lawyers finished their pleas Tuesday and the jury went out that afternoon, about 4 At first it is supposed they stood about half and half, but at 8 p. m. came in with a verdict of not guilty.

Several other state cases have been called up and disposed of. Della Cannan and Cecil Shilling, on charge of petit larceny, and Edward Sanders for assault and battery, were discharged. Burt Oberlain, Ralph Sheely and John Stiffler plead guilty on a charge of petit larceny, but being mere boys the court suspended judgement, which will let them off if they behave and do better. Case of larceny against Dennis Poorman goes to next term. The Deeters cases have not been called. The case of Wm. Bevier against the Houser estate was going on yesterday before Judge Powers and the jury were waiting for the next jury case to come on.

A NARROW ESCAPE!

How it Happened.

The following remarkable event in a lady's life will interest the reader: "For a long time I had a terrible pain at my heart, which fluttered almost incessantly. I had no appetite and could not sleep. I would be compelled to sit up in bed and belch gas from my stomach until I thought every minute would be my last. There was a feeling of oppression about my heart, and I was afraid to draw a full breath. I couldn't sweep a room without sitting down and resting; but, thank God, by the help of New Heart Cure all that is past and I feel like another woman. Before using the New Heart Cure I had taken different so-called remedies and been treated by doctors without any benefit until I was both discouraged and disgusted. My husband bought me a bottle of Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure, and am happy to say I never regretted it, as I now have a splendid appetite and sleep well. I weighed 125 pounds when I began taking the remedy, and now I weigh 130½. Its effect in my case has been truly marvelous. It far surpasses any other medicine I have ever taken or any benefit I ever received from physicians."—Mrs. Harry Starr, Pottsville, Pa., October 12, 1892.

Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure is sold on a positive guarantee by all druggists, or by the Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind., on receipt of price, $1 per bottle, six bottles $5, express prepaid. This great discovery by an eminent specialist in heart disease, contains neither opiates nor dangerous drugs.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Dr. Wm. Allen, one of Auburn's most worthy citizens, came here in 1873 and engaged in the practice of medicine in partnership with Dr. Cowan. The firm in addition to skill in their profession, were alike in an æsthetic taste which found pleasure in embellishing the home with shrubs and flowers. Dr. Allen purchased the Whittington property on South Main street, removed the frame building, and on the site erected what is probably the most serviceable as well as substantial brick residence in Auburn, where unostentatiously his years have been passed.

Ezra D. Hartman, returning to DeKalb county from South Bend where he had been temporarily located, came to Auburn and formed a law partnership with James E. Rose. This strong firm soon attracted a large clientage and till its dissolution by mutual consent, held a leading position in the courts of the existing judicial circuit.

Among mercantile changes was the purchase by S. W. Sprott & Son of the boot and shoe establishment belonging to the estate of C. S. Hare and the sale by Messrs. Wood & Williams of their stock of merchandise in the Case block to Bruce Miller and John Casebeer, fair and square dealing and obliging gentlemen from Hicksville, O.

John L. Davis in the Pioneer Hardware store, in touch with the spirit of progress, increased his stock heavily to keep abreast with growing demands in his line of trade and among other articles received a shipment of three car loads of stoves of superior quality and the use of coal measurably increased until very many homes as well as business houses are so heated and the days of cord wood, as of the wood sawyer, are ended.

S. U. Tarney, versatile and enterprising, installed himself the successor of Messrs. Smith & Hare in the conduct of an exclusively grocery business. This was a new departure, a feature of the place and a pioneer in trading on special lines.

Auburn, expanding, had begun to outgrow the miscellaneous and heterogeneous system of store keeping when goods, groceries, boots and shoes, hats and caps, ready made clothing, drugs and patent medicines were found in the same room in close proximity. Trade prospered, rightly conducted, as interest centered in exclusive sale of some one line, and from then on, branched off till not only a half dozen different establishments found living patronage, but several in the same line, as groceries, shoe, clothing and drug stores, afforded opportunity for choice of dealing to biased customers.

The tavern had ceased to have its bar, the postoffice was no longer kept in a store and religious denominations were fast providing themselves with churches in which to hold their own peculiar services.

Old things, long familiar, were passing away before the march of improvement and there was a tide in the affairs of Auburn which led towards a continuous good fortune. The old tan yard, where is now the Madden Brothers' Marble Works, was destined to become a thing of the past. The vats were filled and all that was left to denote the early industry of Philip Fluke, the Auburn pioneer tanner, was a mound of decaying tanbark and a few time worn sheds.

The assessment of Auburn, unreliable as such returns are, still gave unmistakable evidence of increasing wealth. The value of unimproved incorporate lands was placed at $5,975, of lots, $67,141, of improvements, $101,404, and the value of personal property was given at $140,964, thus making a total of $315,484. The total of taxes assessed on this valuation was $5,692.89.

Complaint was justly made by those desiring to buy property, of excessive and unreasonable prices, not only for lots in new additions, but throughout the corporation. This, to some extent, checked improvements, and the scarcity of houses was such that parties unable to find homes were deterred from remaining.

Property on Main street, later sold for $1,200, would, in 1873, have readily brought $1,500 to $1,800. The number of polls, or men between 25 and 50 years of age, was 241 and an idea of the growth of population is shown by comparison of school enumeration of 1872 with 1873, when 234 was increased to 347, or nearly 50 per cent.

As the close of the year approached, T. C. Mays, his enthusiasm kindled as he wrote, in the full blaze of his peroration said: "It is safe to assert than the growth of Auburn during the past year, in the matter of good and substantial dwellings and business houses and increase of permanent population, greatly exceeds that of any year in its history. Let industries be encouraged until the clatter of machinery is heard in every direction and our people are sending wares of their own make to every part of the land."

We have spoken of W. A. Lowry as a town officer, a contractor and a good citizen. During the fall of 1873, business took him to Delphi, Indiana, near which city he was drowned while attempting to drive through a canal that intersected the public road. His body was brought to Auburn for burial and his funeral was the largest hitherto known to the town.

The Rev. Cone, of the M. E. church preached with pathos and eloquence, and deep sympathy for the family was felt by the community. He was buried with masonic rites by the lodge of which he was an honored member, in the Evergreen cemetery.

On Dec. 9, a sensation was caused by the escape from the old and often condemned county jail, of two prisoners, John Sponogle and Joseph Plunkett, who had been arrested on charge of having stolen goods from cars of the Ee River railroad and whose trial was close at hand. With a bit or auger, somehow provided, they had bored holes through a cell floor and from the basement easily made way through the walls of the foundation and got away. A reward of $100 for their apprehension was offered to no effect and the community was well rid of keeping them and spared the expense of their trial.

No blame was attached to Mr. Meese, who more fortunate than Mr. Plum, his predecessor, was not subjected to an assault, and the event emphasized necessity of providing for more secure confinement of criminals.

Music is a characteristic feature of all celebrations, festivities and public occasions, and not only were the martial and brass bands in the Northern army during the great civil war, no inconsiderable force of themselves, but at the present they number many thousands of our population.

The band is a luxury in country, town and city—an expensive luxury especially to its members without patrons. However complete its organization, its unity is essentially short lived, for the young men who compose it rarely all remain long together, and the admission of recruits requires new outfit, instruction and consequent outlay. For this reason, Auburn has had several fine bands which after brief existence have dissolved, to be in due time reorganized or formed from new material.

What was in 1873 known as the Auburn Silver Cornet Band, was constituted of thirteen members. They took pride in their equipment and liberally contributed to purchase good instruments and serviceable uniforms. The former were provided at a cost of $443, the latter of $450, while sheet music and tuition involved a further outlay of $250, making a total expenditure of $1,143. Computing time passed in practice, and the love of the art and the pride of locality are seen to have influenced the players far more than any hope of gain.

The names of this band of 1873 were, F. Palmer, O. Shaffer, F. Culbertson, J. Abright, J. Spake, E. Coder, C. Brown, J. A. Smith, M. F. Long, T. H. Leasure, H. Wolf and C. Moore and their leader was J. W. McKay. Of this band, excellent during its existence, but two, McKay and Wolf, are twenty years later town residents.

When the time came around for the observance of what is now known as Memorial Day, inquiry was made as to whether any deceased soldiers had been buried in the Auburn cemeteries that the beautiful and patriotic custom of memorial services might be observed and that a proper respect be shown the fallen by a decoration of graves with flowers and flag.

Report was made that there were few soldiers buried in them, and it was thought best to make no public demonstration, but the inquiry was the initiatory movement that in all these later years has become a marked feature in Auburn. Though few veterans then rested in the cemeteries, it is not so now, and the number of the dead exceeds that of the living, who annually meet and march to perform the simple rites of decoration.

It May Do as Much for You.

Mr. Fred Miller, of Irving, Ill, writes that he had a severe kidney trouble for many years, with severe pains in his back, and also that his bladder was affected. He tried many so called kidney cures but without any good result. About a year ago he began the use of Electric Bitters and found relief at once. Electric Bitters is especially adapted to the cure of all kidney and liver troubles and often gives almost instant relief. One trial will prove our statement. Price only 50 cents for large bottles at Robbins & McCord's drug store. 6

The Last Days of the Fair.

The early days and opening weeks of the fair were anything but encouraging to its managers, exhibitors and concessionaries. It seemed to be in vain that they spread out to view the most enlightening, most gorgeous, most interesting collection of sights, wonders and curiosities that were ever grouped together in so small a space within the history of mankind. Yet they called out but a meager few to gaze upon their splendor. The press of the United States and of the world over had devoted more than two years in advertising its wonders, yet people would not believe, and it was not until a sprinkling from each locality had visited the fair and returned to their homes and told of its magnificence that the people in any considerable numbers began to appreciate the importance of visiting the fair and seeing for themselves, and to return and say to others, "The half had not been told me," and that to know anything of its thousand beauties you must visit it yourself. Gradually the numbers began to increase, until a set and increasing tide began to roll into the city from every point of the compass until as on Chicago day, the city was taxed to its utmost to entertain the three quarters of a million visitors. We arrived in Chicago to make our third visit to the fair, on the evening of the 19th of Oct. Found comfortable quarters at a hotel without trouble On the 20th spent the forenoon making business calls and in the afternoon visited the confines of the fair and passed through its mile or more of restaurants that line Stony Island Avenue all along the fair front, and after sampling many of them, must say as a whole they deserve much praise as good, cheap, clean victuals are found in wondrous profusion all along this long line. We visited Buffalo Bill's Wild West show and were not a little disappointed with its stale repetition of worn out farces and painted Indians. We were surprised to find at least 15,000 other people equally disgusted. A good night's rest near the grounds enabled us to get to the fair early Saturday morning, and this being Manhattan or New York day, the grounds were packed with 250,000 visitors, and wherever you went it was crowd all the time, Our first visit was to Horticulture Hall, where acres of the most delicious fruit from every clime upon which the sun shines is displayed in almost endless profusion, from the cranberry to the twenty ounce apple, and from the cucumber pickle to the Canada squash weighing 486 pounds. One of the most attractive small things connected with this department is the German wine exhibit, not the wine, but the faithful reproduction of the hills and valleys of the "Fader Land." We then hurriedly passed through the Transportation Building, spending but little time on this world of wonders in itself, upon which we had devoted nearly two days, and visited the live stock department seeing an endless variety of fowls, sheep, swine, cattle and the horse that has made a record of 2:06 and a fraction. We then visited the great building showing man and his works. One could spend a week in this building and hardly see and understand its thousands of curious and interesting features. Here we see man and woman as they were perfect made as near as can be obtained from a thousand measurements taken from the living fittest survivals. Here also one can find out how near he approaches to the perfect man or woman in heighth, weight, strength, vitality endurance and all that goes to make a perfect man or woman. Leaving this world of wonders we next pass the ruins of ancient Central America and see some of the rudest habitations of savage man and imitations of the gods they worshiped. We then passed an hour or so in the Agricultural Hall and are almost lost among its domestic and foreign exhibits. We pass along the east side of the basin, by the beautiful fountains and gaze with wonder upon the scenes there displayed. We spend a short time in Manufacturer's Building, witness the unequalled display of the electric fountains and the closing magic display of fireworks, then nearly exhausted, join the dense stream of humanity that surges toward the gate, and after a struggle in the tangled mass reach a street car and are soon whirled from the throng, when after a good supper we seek repose after one day spent at the World's Fair of 1893. THE NEWS RECORD.

SUMMARY OF A WEEK'S HAPPENINGS.

The Compromise on a Silver Bill Has Evidently Gone Glimmering—A Wealthy Canadian Disappears in the Wilds of Michigan—Confessed a Murder—Murderer Executed.

Compromise in a Comatose State.

Washington special: The prevailing opinion in the Senate is that the efforts to secure a compromise on the Democratic side will not be renewed, and if it is not the contest will be continued for the greater part of the present week, just as it has been going since the repeal bill was introduced. There are indications that there will not be many more speeches and when these are concluded the voting must necessarily begin. The Republican Senators will make an effort to agree on a plan upon which both the repeal and silver Republicans stand, and if they succeed which hardly seems probable, will try to get Democratic assistance sufficient to put the bill through. Senator Peffer authorizes the statement that the Populists have concluded their part of the fight. It now develops that there are eight Democrats who have not signed the agreement to support the Cockrell-Gorman compromise. They are Hill, Mills, Mitchell of Wisconsin, McPherson, Vilas, Voorhees, Caffery, and Irby.

Street Car Accident.

Seven persons were injured in a grade crossing collision between a street car and an electric motor car at Sixty-third and Halstead streets, Chicago. One victim may die. She is Belle Riley, 6,774 Sherman street, skull fractured. Others were less severely injured. They were all Chicagoans, but one. Lawrence L. Wallace, Clinton, Iowa, bruised about the body; William Johnson, hip and back injured; Dinah Desley, hip and side bruised; Mrs. Horace Webb, bruised about the body; Mrs. E. La Forest, head and body bruised; Amelia Clemens, slight bruises.

Probable Murder.

Saginaw (Mich.) special: Walter F. Hymen, a scion of one of the wealthiest Canadian families, who was recently a lumber jobber at Gladwin, came to Saginaw last week. He had his camp outfit here and displayed several hundred dollars in bills. He started for the woods but nothing has been seen of him since. A telegram from Gladwin says he is not there and his brother C. S. Hymen, a member of parliament for the county of Middlesex, Ont., has arrived here to look him up. It is thought he has been made away with for the sake of his cash.

An Insane Mother's Deed.

At Ripley, Ohio, a shocking discovery was made early the other morning when the door of the cottage of Mrs. A. J. Wagner was forced open by a neighbor. On the floor of the dining room were found the dead bodies of Mrs. Wagner and her two children, aged about four and six, all with their throats cut. The mother had doubtless done the deed, as she has been despondent for some time since the death of her husband, and no doubt finally became completely demented.

Confessed the Murder.

Washington (Ind.) special: James Stone, the man who was ordered in custoday by the grand jury, made a full confession of the brutal butchery of the six members of the family of Denson Wratten. Stone claims he did not have a hand in the killing, but that it was done by Williams, Kays, Clark, White, and Yarbourgh. The crime was a brutal one, and he tells the shocking details. Seven men are now held for the murder, and some of them may be lynched.

Grand Chief Ramsey Indicted.

D. G. Ramsey, grand chief of the Order of Railway Telegraphers, was indicted at Marion, Iowa, by the grand jury of Linn County. He is charged with instigating the cutting and crossing of wires and otherwise obstructing the telegraph system of the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern Railroad during the telegraphers' strike in September, 1892.

Horses and Property Burned.

A fire in Corkorup's livery stable at Lemars, Iowa, consumed forty head of horses and destroyed $100,000 worth of other property.

Murderer Executed.

A Michigan Bank Closed.

Tragedy at Bear Lake, Mich.

At Bear Lake, Mich., M. H. Myers was married the other day. At night there was a noisy charivari. Myers got mad and shot Edgar Kingscott through the bowels and kidneys. Kingscott is in a precarious condition. Kingscott is a highly respected young man. His father was killed by a bull a few weeks ago. The feeling runs high against Myers, owing to the fact that he was the ringleader in a charivari himself two or three weeks ago.

Slight Revival in Business.

New York special: R. G. Dun & Co.'s Weekly Review says: There has been much gain in hope and a little in business. Assurances that the repeal bill will soon be passed have again been accepted by traders as a reason for buying things speculative at higher prices, and with money abundant on call, $88,000,000 having been recived in this city within ten weeks, speculation in stocks and products has an unusual stimulus, and would have expanded even more but for the continued embarrassment of industries. Wheat has risen 1c, helped by heavy foreign purchases, and in spite of better crop prospects, corn is nothing stronger. Pork was lifted so far that another collapse is feared by some, petroleum advanced 1c and Brazil speculators are supposed to be utilizing the bombardments to increase the value of coffee.

NEW TRIAL FOR PETTIT

Granted by the Supreme Court.

Indianapolis special: A new trial was granted to William Pettit, who was sent to the Prison North on the charge of murder, by the Supreme Court. Warden French has been directed to give him into the custody of the Sheriff of Montgomery County. In 1889 Pettit was a prominent minister at Shannemound, Ind. On July 17 of that year his wife died, and he was charged with having poisoned her with strychnine. The preliminary hearing was held at Lafayette, and on account of its sensational nature the notoriety of the case became widespread. The case at once entered the courts, and since that time has slowly dragged its way through these bodies. The trial in the Circuit Court was held at Crawfordsville on a change of venue. It occupied six weeks. The State used circumstantial evidence. It was claimed that Pettit had lost his affection for his wife and become infatuated with Mrs. Whitehead, a Shannemound widow, who was a woman of means and had a large inheritance in prospect. It was charged that he neglected Mrs. Pettit, and if his relations with Mrs. Whitehead were not criminal they were at least of a very intimate social character and such as a minister could not indulge in.

It was charged that the poison was given to Mrs. Pettit in a cup of tea while she was ill. Before the poison could take effect she grew better, and it was asserted by the State that Pettit continued to give her medicine which contained strychnine. He hastened away a short time after her death. The defense claimed that Mrs. Pettit died of a malarial poisoning. It was admitted that strychnine was used about the house for poisoning rats and that Mrs. Pettit had scattered it there herself. The case was brought before the Supreme Court in one of the largest records that was ever filed there. It has proved an expensive controversy since its beginning on account of the able counsel engaged in it.

The appeal to the Supreme Court was taken as soon as Pettit had entered the Northern Prison. Since he began to serve his sentence he has been at work in one of the factories, but prison confinement did not agree with him and he contracted hasty consumption. Information received at the Governor's office stated that Pettit had only a short time to live.

COLLIDED.

Two Express Trains on the Pittsburgh Road.

The second section of No. 25, west bound, on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad and No. 4, east bound, had a head end collision at Monroeville, Ind., in which nearly two dozen persons were more or less injured, but none seriously, or at least fatally. The trainmen of both trains had received orders to pass at Monroeville, and No. 25 had the right of way—that is that train had the right to the main track, while No. 4 was to take the side track. No. 25 had reached Monroeville before No. 4, and was standing on the main track about six car lengths from the switch, waiting for No. 4 to put in an appearance. Engineer Cowan of No. 4, as he approached Monroeville lost his bearings, the dense fog obscuring the usual landmarks. There are two street crossings a short distance west of Monreville switch and it was these he was looking for to set him right as to his exact location. He passed one, or rather he passed both of them, but thought that he had only passed one, when he was suddenly made aware of his whereabouts by seeing the switch lights flash by his cab window. He reversed his engine, put on the air, and succeeded in checking the speed of his train to a slight degree, but not sufficiently to prevent his engine striking the other while going at a rate of probably fifteen or twenty miles an hour. He remained at his post and suffered some severe injuries, principally by being scalded by escaping steam. His fireman, L. C. Daily, and Brakeman F. E. Hunt were standing in the gangway of the engine, ready to get off and throw the switch. They jumped and both were badly injured. Baggagemaster Stevens was injured internally by trunks falling on him. The passengers were still in their berths and about twenty were slightly injured.

A NEW YORK FIRE.

Most Destructive Blaze in New York Since 1858.

New York special: One of the most destructive fires this city has seen since the great fire of 1858 occurred Thursday evening. The fire extended from St. Raphael's Roman Catholic church on Fortieth street west of Tenth Avenue, to the north side of Forty-second Street. The loss will amount well up into the millions.

The fire was discovered at 8:10 p. m. by a watchman employed by William Campbell & Co., wholesale manufacturers of wall paper at Nos. 512 to 518 West Forty-second Street to 505 and 513 West Forty-first street. The fire started in the boiler house, and had gained great headway before it was discovered. It spread to the adjoining building, occupied by Nevins & Haviland, also wall paper manufacturers, on Tenth avenue and Forty-second street. Both firms were entirely burned out. Other buildings burned were No. 506 West Forty-second street, occupied by Dr. Leightons: 508 West Forty-second street, occupied by J. Wheelihan: 510 West Forty-second street, St. Raphael's Club House; 520 West Forty-second street, occupied by F. Vanbuskirk; 524 West Forty-second street, occupied by Arthur Short; 526 West Forty-second street, occupied by M. C. Guire, all of which were totally destroyed. The boarding-house run by Mrs. M. C. Romy, at 528 West Forty-second street, was also partially destroyed.

The estimated losses are: Campbell & Co., $500,000, although Mr. Campbell, who was on the ground, said that his loss was not less than $2,000,000, and was covered by only $500,000 insurance; Nevins & Haviland, $200,000; the private houses on Forty-second street, $150,000. Schastey & Sons, $250,000; Loewers' brewery, $50,000: two tenement houses, $50,000; buildings on Tenth avenue between Fortieth and Forty-second streets, principally tenement houses and stores, $100,000; houses, tenements, and factories on the north side of Forty-second street, on the east side of Tenth avenue and the south side of Forty-first street, which were blistered and cracked by the heat to the extent of $50,000.

Fatal Collapse.

The building occupied by the Blunenstiel Carriage Manufacturing Company of Hopkinsville, Ky., collapsed, killing one man, and in all probability fatally wounding two others. The building was undergoing repairs, the roof had been taken off and the brick of the upper walls had been piled on the floor of the second story. The weight of them caused the collapse. John Warner, a brick layer from Nashville, Tenn., was instantly killed. Charles Davis, a bricklayer from Clarksville, Tenn., had both legs broken and sustained internal injuries from which he will die. An unknown man was also fatally hurt. Several other workmen sustained injuries more or less serious.

He Did Well.

New York special: Wm. Freudenthal, an insurance agent, was held in $15,000 bail in the Yorkville Police Court on a charge of larceny to the amount of $87,000 made by Albert and Kate Wagner. Mr. and Mrs. Wagner are very wealthy, and sailed for Europe on May 7, leaving their property in charge of Freudenthal. They gave him a power of attorney, and on coming back on October 1, found that he had sold two of their houses for $87,000, and had taken mortgages on this property, sold them, speculated in stocks and lost nearly all the money.

Frightful Explosion.

An explosion of gas occurred in the dye works of C. L. Trotter at Spokane, Wash., setting fire to the building and adjoining book-store. There were a number of people in the book-store and the fire spread so rapidly that Mrs. William Bean was caught in the building and burned to death in full view of the crowd on the street. Four others were injured and it is feared some lives were lost in the dye works, but the explosion wrecked the building so it is impossible to determine until the debris is cleared. The property loss is about $10,000.

Talks of a Crime.

Wooster (Ohio) special: A man having papers and letters in his pockets showing him to be George W. Mann of 1246 Girard avenue, Philadelphia, was found along the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago tracks at Millbrook coal chute, in an unconscious condition, terribly cut and bruised, and his left eye lying on his cheek. He was unable to tell how he was injured. In his delirium he talks about some crime, and it is believed that he is a fugitive from justice.

Affairs Unchanged at Rio.

The London Exchange Telegraph Company says that it is informed that affairs at Rio de Janeiro are unchanged, and that the stories circulated regarding much destruction of property and considerable loss of life at Rio are without foundation of fact. Both sides, the Exchange Telegraph Company adds, are awaiting the result of the coming elections and will not push matters to any extent until the voice of the people has been heard.

Coal Mines to Resume.

Brazil (Ind.) special: Weaver, Getz & Co., one of the largest coal producing firms in Indiana, which failed last May, will resume business at once. The assignee has turned the business back with the firm, all attachments having been satisfied. They will immediately open both the Louis and Churchill mines at Center Point, employing 600 men.

Burned by Natural Gas.

The house of J. H. Bailey in North Marion, Ind., was the scene of a natural gas explosion. A stove had been taken from the house and the gas pipe plugged. The gas forced the stopper out, causing the explosion. Mrs. Bailey and one of her children were so badly burned that there is but little hopes of their recovery.

Killed Her Father.

William Greenwood, a resident of Brooksburg, Ind., returned from a hunting excursion and set his gun down, when the daughter picked it up, and, in handling the lock, accidentally discharged the gun. The contents struck the father, tearing off his head, causing instant death.

Invalid Lady Cremated.

Mrs. Miller, a helpless invalid, was cremated in her house at Kemp, Ohio, The other members of the family had gone to Lima, leaving her alone, and when they returned the house was in ruins and the old lady burned to an unrecognizable mass.

Ft. Worth's Big Failure.

At Ft. Worth, Texas, Stratton & White, electrical and general implement dealers, filed a deed of trust for $400,000, with but $50,000 preferred. This is the largest failure Ft. Worth has ever had.

Toy Dealers Attached.

B. Feigubaum & Co., wholesale toy merchants of San Francisco, have been attached. The claims against them aggregate $140,000.

Smallpox in New York.

Twenty five cases of smallpox in New York city were reported to the sanitary authorities during last week.

A Serious Wreck.

A serious wreck is reported on the Illinois Central near Kankakee, Ill Several were killed and injured.

WERE BURNED ALIVE.

HORRIFYING WRECK ON THE GRAND TRUNK.

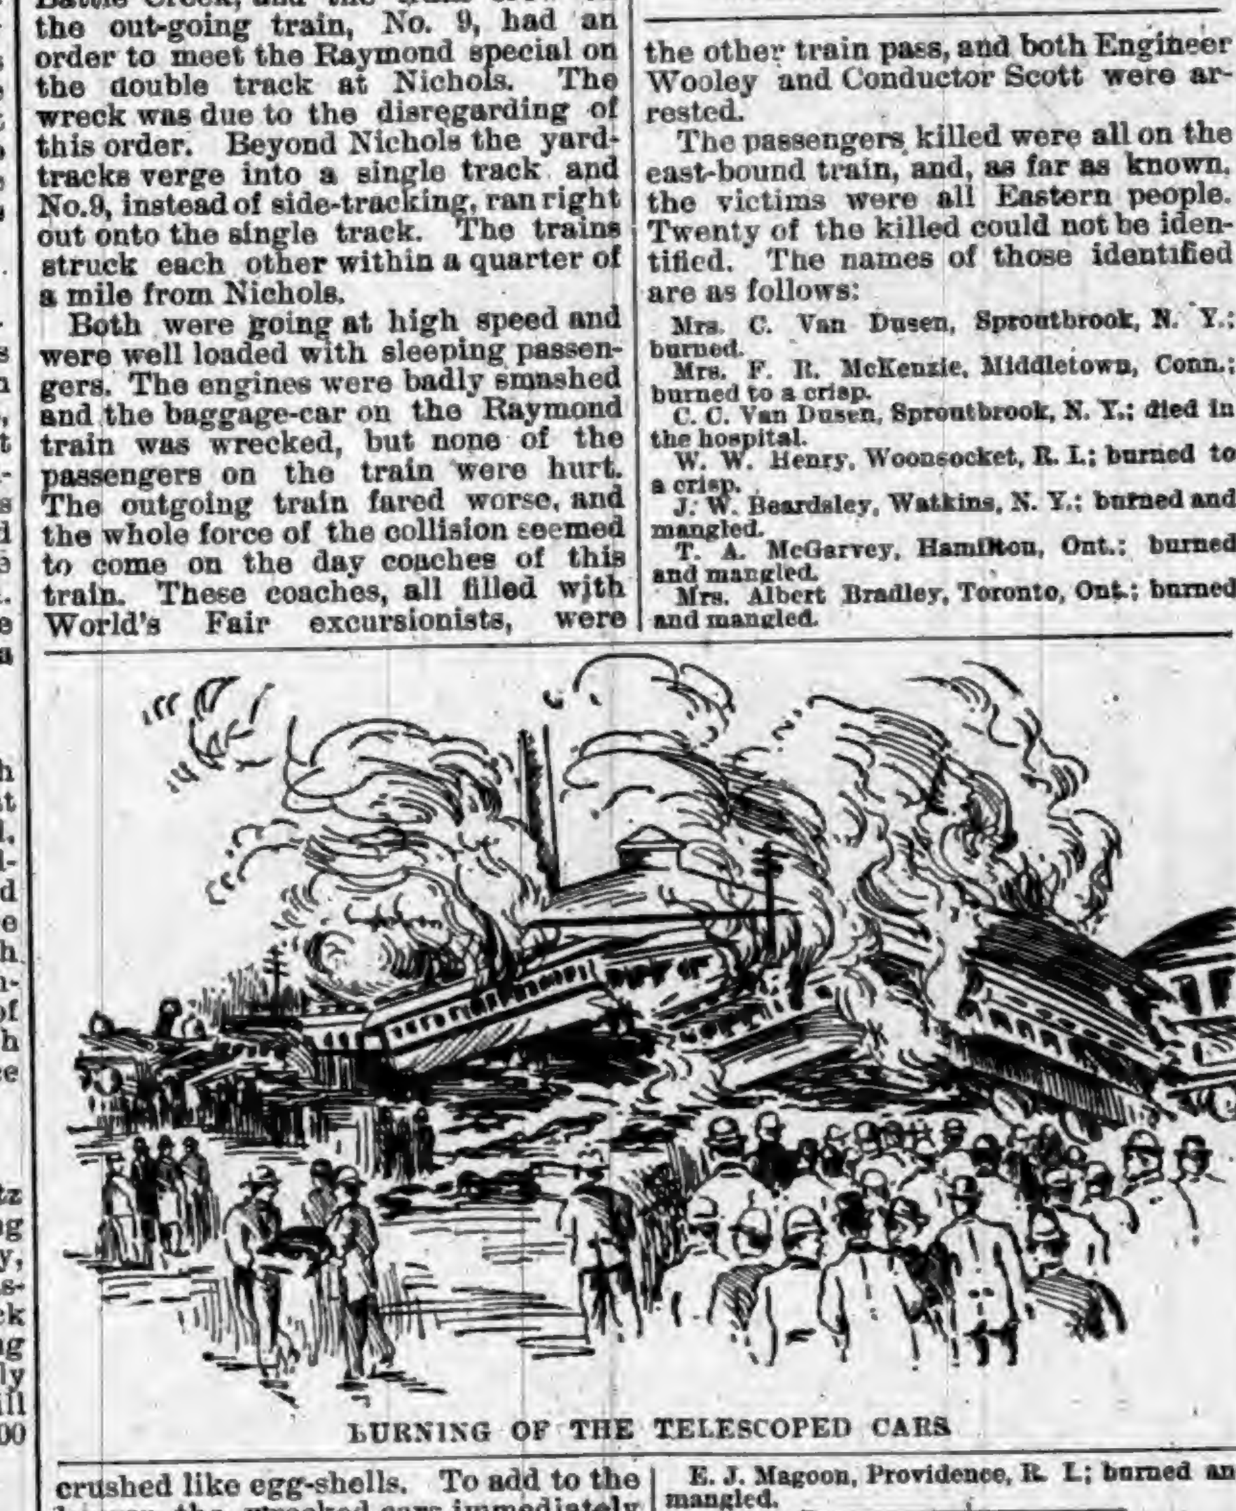
Passenger Trains Going at Full Speed Collide—Cars Take Fire and Are Reduced to Ashes—Many Bodies Burned Beyond Recognition.

An Engineer's Blunder.

A railroad wreck more terrible in its results than any other of the many horrors which have been recorded since the heavy World's Fair passenger traffic began occurred on the Grand Trunk Road at Nichols, Mich., about one mile east of Battle Creek, at 4 o'clock Friday morning. Two passenger trains collided, several coaches were demolished and shortly after caught fire, roasting twenty-six imprisoned passengers until the remains were unrecognizable, while over thirty others are injured, two of whom may die.

The trains which collided were a Raymond and Whitcomb special, being run as the first section of No. 6, known as the Atlantic express, and No. 9, the Pacific express. The Grand Trunk yards lie between Battle Creek and Nichols, which is one mile east of Battle Creek, and the train crew on the out-going train, No. 9, had an order to meet the Raymond special on the double track at Nichols. The wreck was due to the disregarding of this order. Beyond Nichols the yard-tracks verge into a single track and No. 9, instead of side-tracking, ran right out onto the single track. The trains struck each other within a quarter of a mile from Nichols.

Both were going at high speed and were well loaded with sleeping passengers. The engines were badly smashed and the baggage-car on the Raymond train was wrecked, but none of the passengers on the train were hurt. The outgoing train fared worse, and the whole force of the collision seemed to come on the day coaches of this train. These coaches, all filled with World's Fair excursionists, were crushed like egg-shells. To add to the horror, the wrecked cars immediately caught fire, and, with their mangled occupants, were burned to ashes.



BURNING OF THE TELESCOPED CARS

The scene of the wreck immediately after the collision was most appalling. The groans of the injured and dying rent the cold morning air, through which a drizzling rain fell, and dense darkness prevailed. The frantic cries of those who escaped were almost as terrible to hear as the groans of the suffering. Where the wreck occurred the country is only thinly populated by farmers, and those who were around hastened to the spot and did whatever they could to assist in recovering the dead and wounded from the burning mass of wreckage and to alleviate the suffering of the injured. As soon as the news reached Battle Creek the fire department and a corps of surgeons was dispatched to Nichols, where they did heroic service. When they arrived there this is what they saw:

The two front cars were telescoped and lay in big, shattered pieces within the length of one car. The other two had jammed tightly together. Men and women were crawling out through broken windows. Some of them were breaking away the glass with their bare hands, while other frantic men and women behind them were fighting to get past them and crawl out. Women were screaming and men were shouting. Some who had leaped through the windows lay helpless on the ground, while others were falling on them. Men with bloody hands and faces and women with torn dresses shouted the names of missing friends. These are the old incidents of a railway horror.

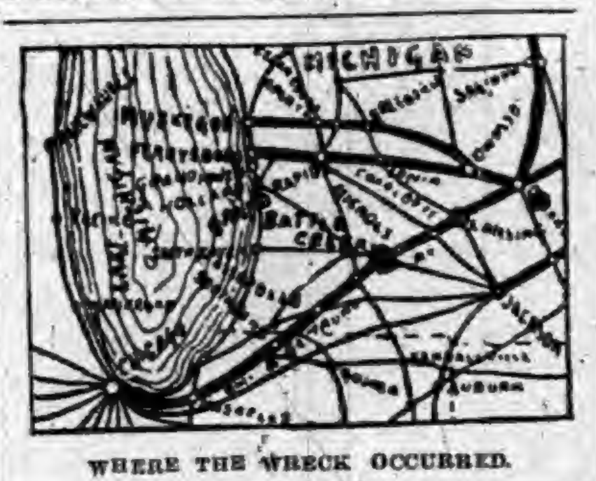
Passengers Roasted to Death.

Then smoke began to curl up from the mass of wreckage where the two cars were telescoped. Within five minutes the smoke was followed by leaping flames. Men who stood there and watched the wreck burn say that they heard shrieks and cries coming from the interior of the oven. It would be pleasanter to think that the twenty-five lay senseless or perhaps dead and did not suffer the torture of suffocation and slow burning. One at least died a horrible death in full view of 100 helpless men. She was a woman who had crawled half-way out of the window. Her dress was torn from her shoulders and her hair had fallen about her face. She was a handsome woman, not more than 30 years old. When the rescuers first saw her they climbed up and tried to draw her through the window. They found that a heavy timber lay across her. "Hurry up; please hurry up," she said, as the fear crossed her mind that perhaps she was possibly in danger of burning. A minute later, while strong men were straining to extricate her, this possibility became a probability and the flames crept rapidly toward the imprisoned woman. "You shan't burn we'll get you out," cried the men, heroically, as they wrestled frantically with the splintered timbers. There was a lull of speech for five minutes. The rescuers had become giants in strength and madmen in desperation, and they struggled wildly with the tangled wood and iron. The woman was silent, and gazed imploringly and inquiringly into the faces of the firemen. "My God! Oh, my God!" suddenly burst from the lips of one of the heroic workers, and in that despairing heart-cry the helpless woman read her death warrant. She gave an agonized wail, and then her woman's weakness gave way to her martyr's strength. "I can die. Oh, yes, I can die, if I must," she said soothingly to the strong men who were weeping in their impotent strength. Again they struggled breathlessly to the rescue, but the flames were encircling the party and claimed the victim the crash had spared. "I am a Christian," she said resignedly and a moment later her voice was raised in prayer. She gave her name, Mrs. Charles Van Dusen, of Sprout Brook, N. Y. The flames now completely encircled her, the firemen were driven away, the praying lips were stilled, and the soul of Mrs. Van Dusen had passed beyond the fury of the elements of the earth. An hour later the husband for whom she had left a loving message joined her in the world to come.

Taken to the Morgue in Baskets.

Not until the firemen had quenched the flames was the full extent of the disaster realized, and the heartrending spectacle then presented caused strong men to weep. Twenty-five horrible and shapeless chunks—no other word will express it—of human flesh, burned to a crisp, were made visible, and these—all that remained of the victims of one of the most sickening railroad accidents of recent years—were gathered up in baskets, in bags, and in one case, a pail, and carried tenderly to the morgue in Battle Creek.

The accident occurred because the engineer of No. 6, going east, disobeyed orders by not stopping at Nichols to let the other train pass, and both Engineer Wooley and Conductor Scott were arrested.



WHERE THE WRECK OCCURRED.

The passengers killed were all on the east-bound train, and, as far as known, the victims were all Eastern people. Twenty of the killed could not be identified. The names of those identified are as follows:

Mrs. C. Van Dusen, Sproutbrook, N. Y.; burned.
Mrs. F. R. McKenzie, Middletown, Conn.; burned to a crisp.
C. C. Van Dusen, Sproutbrook, N. Y.; died in the hospital.
W. W. Henry, Woonsocket, R. I.; burned to a crisp.
J. W. Beardsley, Watkins, N. Y.; burned and mangled.
T. A. McGarvey, Hamilton, Ont.; burned and mangled.
Mrs. Albert Bradley, Toronto, Ont.; burned and mangled.
E. J. Magoon, Providence, R. I.; burned and mangled.

VAN ALEN IS CONFIRMED.

Senate Endorses His Nomination as Minister to Italy.

Washington special: Mr. Van Alen will be United States Minister to Italy. The Senate in executive session confirmed the nomination by a vote of 39 to 22. The fight against him was very bitter, but was unsuccessful. The charges were that he was not a representative American citizen, being a resident of London a greater part of the time, and that he bought the office by a $50,000 donation to the Cleveland campaign fund.

Eight persons were seriously injured, and many more suffered from bruises that did not require the attention of a surgeon. It was a miracle that nobody was killed.

MRS. GREEK, aged 82 years, residing twelve miles east of Wabash, was probably fatally injured by a vicious ram. She cannot survive.

THE 6-year-old son of Henry Miller, owner of a tile mill five miles north of Wabash, met with a fatal accident. While playing around the shafting in his father's mill he accidentally fell upon the belt, and was carried down between the wheel and the belt. His head was crushed. ONE of the boldest robberies ever committed in Northern Indiana was perpetrated near South Bend. In a little old house nine miles northest of the city resided alone Mrs. Jane McMichael, a widow, and the wealthiest woman in St. Joseph County. She kept a portion of her wealth in the house. The other night, while she was dozing in a chair, the door was burst open and three men, with faces partly covered by handkerchiefs, bolted in. The woman ran from one room to another, but she was finally caught and bound and made to tell where her money was hidden. The robbers got $120. Believing she had more, they threatened to burn her alive if she did not give it up. She told them it was all she had, and they finally left, leaving her tied until friends arrived and released her, half dead with fright.

THE NATION'S SOLONS.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Our National Law-Makers and What They Are Doing for the Good of the Country—Various Measures Proposed, Discussed, and Acted Upon.

Doings of Congress.

The Senate met with large attendance Monday morning, but the opponents of repeal so managed matters that no vote could be taken. The House resumed the discussion of the McCreary bill to amend the Geary Chinese exclusion act. The first amendment called up was that offered by Mr. Geary defining a Chinese merchant and containing the photographic feature. It was agreed to with practical unanimity, the vote standing 120 to 10. An amendment was agreed to providing that no Chinese person heretofore convicted in a court of the United States shall be permitted to register. The question then recurred on a lengthy subject offered by Mr. Mahon (Rep. Pa.) the purport of which is that it shall be the duty of the master of any vessel carrying all Chinese or other en immigrants to receive a statement from each passenger. Lost. The question was then upon the final passage of the bill, and on a standing vote there were 167 in the affirmative and 9 in the negative.

Tuesday was a day of sensation in the Senate. Senator Sherman and Senator Hill were the central figures, each speaking in the same line, and each arraigning the Senate for its dilatory action. Their remarks effectually awakened every member, and it is believed some action is now close at hand. The House resumed consideration of the House banking bill. A substitute was offered by Mr. Cox including directors with salaried officers of national banks within the operation of the act. It was agreed to, 78 to 45.

The time of the Senate Wednesday was occupied in listening to Messrs. Hill and Mills, who spoke in favor of repeal. The remainder of the week in the House promises to be exceedingly dull. It was decided to postpone consideration of the bankruptcy bill, and after the disposal of the regular morning business, the House went ahead with the consideration of the printing bill. During the first morning hour Mr. Wolverton from the Committee on Judiciary called up the bill to reduce and regulate the fees and work of the United States District and Circuit Courts and terms made by district attorneys, marshals, and commissioners. It was passed. Mr. Geary called up the New Jersey bridge bill. DeWitt Warner, of New York, and Geary almost came to blows in a dispute over an amendment to the bill, after which it was passed. The House then resumed consideration of the printing bill.

Thursday, the Senate talked and did nothing. In the House, a bill granting some 2,000 acres of land in Arizona to use in connection with the territorial prison at Yuma, was passed. The bill requiring railroad companies which have been granted rights of way through Territorial lands of the United States to maintain stations at all town sites established by the Interior Department received some attention, though not final, and consideration of the printing bill was then resumed, but was suspended when by a previous order the House proceeded to pay its tribute to the memory of the late Representative Mutchler of Pennsylvania. At the conclusion of the memorial services the House at 3:45 p. m., as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, adjourned.

Aside from some spasmodic and fruitless attempts to get action on the repeal bill, the Senate Friday confirmed a large batch of appointments, the most notable of which was that of Van Alen for the Italian mission, by a vote of 39 to 22. The Attorney general transmitted to the House, pursuant to resolution, the information relating to the Union Pacific Railroad. He says the Government was not made a party to the receivership proceedings and had no notice of such proceedings; that there is grave doubt as to their validity as far as the United States is concerned, and that in their practical operation they tend to seriously prejudice the interests of the Government as protected by existing laws. The Attorney General further says that the only action yet taken by the department has been the employment of George Hoadley as special counsel for the United States. In the second morning hour Mr. Bynum called up the bill to remit 50 per cent. of the duties due on exhibits at the World's Fair. An amendment was adopted extending the provisions of the act to such exhibits as may be transferred to the midwinter Exposition at San Francisco. As amended the resolution was then passed. This does not apply to goods sold or contracted for for before the passage of the resolution.

Saturday the Senate talked. The House was in session only three hours, two-thirds of the time being devoted to the further consideration of the printing bill. It reached a vote, but no quorum appearing it went over to be the unfinished business at the first session. A bill was passed directing the construction of a revenue cutter for use on the New England coast.

The Frog Market.

Thirty thousand frogs a week are brought into the Buffalo market. Even the local fishermen are devoting much of their time to collecting frogs, for 100 of which they are receiving $1 at the present time. A Buffalo fish company is the largest buyer. It freezes the legs for quick New York consumption, and also stores large quantities for profitable sales at other seasons. The business of securing the frogs is very remunerative to the man who knows their haunts. Twelve hundred were brought into the city on a recent evening by a fisherman who takes them along the lake shore on the Canadian side. One of them was a cow frog that weighed two and an eighth pounds and sold for a dollar and a quarter, its legs being as large as those of a good-sized spring chicken. There are three methods of killing the frogs—with a stick, by spearing, and by shooting. The best time to hunt for them is about the middle of the day, when they come out of their hiding-places and seek the meadows, pastures and fields where the grain has been cut, in search of insects. Very few frogs are caught in the marshes or on the banks of the lakes, as it is only at night they gather in those localities. In winter they are either caught with a net, which is dipped under the ice, or dug out with a spade from the side of the banks, and are invariably caught in clusters, for they huddle together.

AT WAR WITH HERSELF.

"If you think there is any doubt, however slight, tell me. Leave me here to my old life, to its monotony, its dreary gloom; I can bear it now, I could never return to it, once I left it."

"There is none," returned the lawyer, gravely. "I did not wait upon you until everthing was perfectly clear; there cannot be the faintest dispute as to your title. The probability is that, if the Earl of Charnleigh had made a will, he would have left everything to Captain Paul Flemyng, who, in the genealogical table, stands next to you. He is the only member of the family, I believe, that the Earl ever saw or noticed. I remember once he mentioned your father, and asked me if he had left any children. I answered, 'Yes—one daughter.' 'It puzzles me,' he said, 'why there are so many women in the world; could do better with just half the number.'"

"Did he know my father?" she asked.

"No, only by repute, as being a brave young officer. The truth was, he liked no one; if such a thing could be, I should say he was a hater of his kind."

"And this captain—what name did you say?"

"Captain Paul Flemyng," repeated the lawyer, and she half whispered the name.

Did any warning come to her then of the tragedy that was to shadow her after life—the weight that was to make the coronet a burden?

"Paul Flemyng—and is he disappointed?" she asked.

"I cannot tell. He may have thought the chances were greatly in his favor; but he is too true a gentleman and too brave a man to envy the happiness that has fallen to a lady's lot."

"I hope he is not disappointed," she said; "pleased as I cannot help feeling, I should not like to purchase my happiness by another's pain."

"Even should Captain Flemyng feel pain he will not show it," observed the lawyer.

"Do you say I shall have a great deal of money? He could have some of it. I am not obliged to keep it all myself."

Mr. Clements smiled at the simple words—perhaps another idea suggested itself to him.

"I do not think that will be needed," he remarked. "Captain Flemyng has some property besides the income derived from his profession. He is at present with his regiment at Malta."

"What relation is Captain Flemyng to me?" she asked, looking up at him with the questioning glance of a child.

"I should say about fourth cousin, if such relationship exists at all. Your father was the late Earl's second cousin. Captain Flemyng stands three degrees lower on the family tree. I wrote to him at once, and told him there was no will. It is six months since the late Earl died. Every possible search has been honestly made, and there is no trace of his ever having intended to make a will—no memorandum, no papers. During that time we have anxiously made out the claim of each relative, and yours is the strongest, the clearest, and the truest; indeed, your title is so perfectly clear that you might safely take possession of Crown Leighton to-morrow."

"What shall I do?" she cried. And again the beautiful young face grew deadly pale. "How can I bear the change? I shall not know what to do with my life."

"There will be much for you to consider. Have you no lady relatives of your mother's living?"

"No," she replied, with an outburst of passionate sadness. "It may be true that I am a countess, but I am quite alone in the world."

"I should suggest that you at once engage the services of some elderly lady as chaperon. You cannot live alone. Perhaps Miss Templeton would be the best person to consult in the emergency."

Mr. Clements here rose from his seat and bowed with an air of deference he had not shown before.

"Permit me," he said, "now that my legal business is explained, to be the first to offer my congratulations to the Countess of Charnleigh. I pray heaven to bless your ladyship in your new life, and to send you every blessing and prosperity and every earthly happiness."

"I thank you," she said gently.

Then Mr. Dunscombe stood up and offered his congratulations.

"If you will allow me," said the lawyer, "I will wait upon you, Lady Charnleigh, to-morrow. I have an imperative engagement this evening; to-morrow I hope to have something to suggest that will meet with your entire approbation."

With the most respectful of salutations, they left her standing like one entranced; as they left her, so she remained, until the sound of the door opening aroused her.

CHAPTER IV.

"Now, Miss Rayner," said a rough voice, "if you and your visitors have done with the room, I shall be glad to get it ready for my mistress."

The insolent tone and the sharp words generally brought a proud flush into the beautiful face; now the young girl looked at Susan Netley, the cross house-maid, as though she had not even heard her.

"I have lived at King's Court," continued the aggrieved domestic, "for many years, but this is the first time I ever saw governesses and their friends make so free."

"If she knew," thought Leonie, smiling, "instead of being insolent to me, she would fawn and flatter—she would cringe to me. Ah, the power of this wonderful gold!"

The maid-servant was annoyed to see that she had produced no effect.

"I shall certainly tell Miss Templeton the minute she returns why my work is not done," she continued; but to her surprise the young girl merely left the room, with the same strange smile on her face.

She wanted to be alone, she must be alone to think over this wondrous event.

She sat in the dull, gloomy playground until the clock struck five; no one came to tell her that tea was waiting; no one seemed to care whether she had anything or not. As she re-entered the house, Susan met her and said, not very civilly:

"Your tea has been waiting, Miss Rayner, in the school-room for an hour past."

She laughed aloud as she thought how different it would be soon, and then time passed in another dream until Miss Templeton returned.

At 7 the formidable mistress of King's Court was to return. Leonie had been accustomed to count the hours with a certain kind of dread; now she sat so completely entranced in her glorious dream that she did not even hear the noise of the much-anticipated arrival. It was a custom of Miss Templeton's to keep the governess pupil in her place, as she expressed it, by continually finding fault with her. When she returned from her holidays, it required some ingenuity to make out a list of complaints against the young girl, but she generally succeeded. On this occasion she did not linger long over the dainty tea prepared for her. Susan, fired with indignation at Miss Rayner's insensibility, was only too pleased to tell how the young governess had had visitors in the drawing-room, and had spent over two hours with them. Miss Templeton went at once to the school-room, where she found the young lady seated before her cold, untasted tea.

A frosty greeting passed between them, and then Miss Templeton seated herself in state.

"I am sorry to hear, Miss Rayner," she began, "that your conduct during my absence has not been so circumspect as I could have wished. May I ask who were the gentlemen you entertained for more than two hours to-day?"

There was a faint ripple of a smile on the beautiful lips, which angered Miss Templeton very much.

"Two hours," continued the schoolmistress, "is a long time for any lady to spend in the society of gentlemen, above all of strangers, as I should imagine these to have been."

"Then I must demand an explanation of your conduct, Miss Rayner. King's Court is both known and honored for the exemplary conduct of its conductor. If you have deviated in the slightest degree from established rules, we must part."

No fear shaded the bright eyes that looked laughingly into the stony face.

"The gentlemen introduced themselves, Miss Templeton. I am quite innocent of having known of their visit beforehand."

"Will you tell me who they were?" repeated the angry lady.

"Mr. Clements, a lawyer of Lincoln's Inn, and Mr. Dunscombe, the manager or steward of the Crown Leighton estates."

"May I be permitted to inquire what they wanted with you, Miss Rayner?" said Miss Templeton, somewhat wonderingly.

"They came on business that astonished me, Miss Templeton, as it will you. They came to tell me that owing to a strange chain of circumstances, Fortune has played a jest upon me."

"I do not understand riddles," said Miss Templeton, coldly.

"Fortune has been amusing herself at my expense. If the gentleman's researches are correct, I am now Countess of Charnleigh."

"You are what?" she said.

"I am Countess of Charnleigh, and mistress of the Crown Leighton estates."

"My dearest child, you cannot mean it! You are jesting, Miss Rayner!"

"I am speaking in all sober truth," she rejoined, calmly.

"But your mother was only governess—your father quite poor!"

"Poor, but for all that of good family and a gentleman. It is as his daughter, Miss Templeton, that I am Countess of Charnleigh."

CHAPTER V.

Miss Templeton, in after life, was accustomed to tell the story, and declared that she had never received such a terrible shock. She could but repeat the words in a helpless fashion.

"Countess of Charnleigh! Explain to me—my mind is not clear."

And Leonie, half indignant, half amused, gave the lady a complete resume of the history she had heard herself. When it was ended Miss Templeton rose from her chair and embraced her.

"My dearest child—my favorite pupil—I am so heartily glad, so pleased, so delighted—I am overwhelmed." The stony face and dull, lusterless eyes wore a look of excitement that completely changed Miss Templeton. "For your own sake I am so pleased. Countess of Charnleigh! The title is a proud one—you will do it justice. I always thought there was something distingue, something aristocratic about you."

"Did you?" asked the young girl, wonderingly. "I fancied you were never very pleased with my manner."

Miss Templeton positively blushed—a phenomenon that had not occurred for years.

"Those who have the charge of youth must be severe," she said, "or, the youthful character never would be formed. My dear child, what advice you will need! What a terrible, almost awful responsibility for you! You will indeed require help."

"So Mr. Clements says. He is coming to-morrow to consult with you, for I am young to be a countess in my own right and mistress of a vast fortune. Yesterday I felt so old, so tired so weary of my life; to-day—I cannot help it—my heart is like a singing-bird."

Miss Templeton looked at her in wonder; the young girl had never said so much to her in all her life before.

"That is but natural, Lady Charnleigh. I had better give you your title at once—it will accustom you to the sound. You must have some lady of experience with you; you cannot live alone. Countess of Charnleigh! I cannot get over my surprise."

At that moment Susan entered with a message. The expression of gratified revenge on her face did not escape the notice of either lady. She looked with an air of triumph at Leonie,

"Susan," said Miss Templeton, sharply. "I desire that you do not annoy Miss Rayner again. If she wishes to have the drawing-room for her visitors, remember it is always at her service."

Susan left the room full of rage and astonishment, contemptuously wondering to herself what was going to happen that Miss Templeton should be so civil to a governess.

That night Leonie was Miss Templeton's most honored guest. She was allowed to go out on the lawn and sit under the shade of a great drooping cedar until the moon and the stars gleamed in the darkening sky. A large magnolia grew near and its rich fragrance seemed to fill the air, and gave to her dreams of luxury and magnificence such as come only under the influence of rare odors.

Then the state bedroom, hitherto reserved for the most honored guests, was at her disposal. Lady Charnleigh smiled as she saw how carefully it had been prepared.

It was pleasant when she rose to mark the deference the servants paid to her, the extra respect; how each one called her "Lady Charnleigh," and waited upon her; and she was young enough and woman enough to be pleased at these things, and feel life life more pleasant with them.

Mr. Clements called before noon, and then there was no more doubt, no more hesitation. Her claim was allowed on all sides, and she might at any moment she liked take her place in the world as Countess of Charnleigh.

Even the change in the lawyer's manner she noted. He was politeness itself, deferential, respectful, with somewhat of kindliness, that was extended, perhaps, because of her youth and inexperience.

"Do I really understand you that my dear pupil can take possession of her estate at once?" said Miss Templeton, whose surprise could still be barely repressed.

"To-day, to-morrow, or any time she wills," was the reply. "If I may venture upon making a suggestion to Lady Charnleigh, it is that she should, under Miss Templeton's chaperonage, go at once to town, and there make such purchases as she may deem fit; then, when ready, I advise no further delay in going to Crown Leighton. If your ladyship will authorize me, I will at once write to one or two influential people who will be able to recommend a proper and suitable companion."

"You mean that I am to buy new dresses," she said, looking at him with her face in a glow of delight. "How shall I know what kind of dresses a countess should wear? My wildest dreams never went beyond a pretty silk."

He smiled. Miss Templeton looked distressed.

"Your best plan, Lady Charnleigh," she suggested, "will be to drive at once to Madam Berton and let her get everything necessary; she will know if you do not. As a matter of course, you must for some time wear mourning; but, as expense will not be a matter of consideration, you can have it as elegant as possible."

"I should explain to your ladyship," continued Mr. Clements, gravely, "that during the six months we have spent in ascertaining the claims of different and distant relatives, the income derived from various sources, to be afterward explained to you, has accumulated and has been lying on my hands. I have brought with me a check for a thousand pounds. You can do afterward as you will;" and he looked half wistfully at this young girl on whom the mantle of splendid estates had so suddenly fallen.

"A thousand pounds!" said Leonie, Lady Charnleigh. "And I have never in my whole life before had five shillings of my own."

"Perhaps, after all, the best way to acquire a true appreciation of money is to want it," said Mr. Clements. "And now, Lady Charnleigh, it only remains for me to add that whenever you think of going to Crown Leighton I shall be happy to attend you."

"I should like to give half of this away," she said; "how many people would be made happy by a little money!" She was looking with her bright eyes full of wonder at the check he had laid before her.

"Yet I cannot imagine Chevalier Bayard, or King Arthur, or any of the heroes I loved, caring for it," rejoined Leonie; "there is nothing grand or heroic in the love of money."

"For the present be content with enjoying it, Lady Charnleigh," said the lawyer, smiling kindly; "you can moralize about it afterward."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

A STEAMER'S BILL OF FARE.

The cost of provisioning an ocean steamer of the present day is very great. In a year the provisioning of only one boat will, as a fair average, include 500 sheep, 200 lambs, 3,000 oxen, 300 fowls, as many ducks and miscellaneous poultry, besides several thousand head of game and other sundries. Add to these a hundred thousand eggs, 10 tons of ham and bacon, 5 tons of fish, 2 tons of cheese, 1,000 tins of sardines, 100 tons of potatoes, 5,000 loaves and 50 tons of flour biscuits, 5 tons of jam and marmalade, 3 tons of oatmeal, 2 tons each of rice and peas, pearl barley, plums and currants, and 12 tons of sugar, with a ton of tea and 3 tons of coffee, and you have what may be called the backbone of the daily fare. The drink bill will average per vessel per year about 50,000 bottles of beer, 20,000 mineral waters, 3,000 bottles of spirits and 5,000 bottles of wine.

We have only mentioned the necessaries and said nothing of the luxuries, which we ought not entirely to omit. Let it be added, then, that each passenger averages three oranges, almost as many apples, and half as many lemons a day; and that the ice cream supplied averages a pint a head a week; and that on an Atlantic trip, taken at a venture, the fruit bill included 160 melons, 100 pineapples, 10 crates of peaches, 10 bunches of bananas, 100 quarts each of gooseberries and currants, 250 quarts each of raspberries, strawberries and cherries, and 75 pounds of grapes.

The breakages are simply appalling. During one week, not so very long ago, the steward's return on one well-known liner showed an average breakage list of 900 plates, 280 cups, 438 saucers, 1,213 tumblers, 200 wine glasses, 27 decanters, and 63 water bottles, all of which had, of course, to be made good on arrival in port.

New Story of Washington.

Here is a new story of the Father of his Country. Washington's head gardener was a man from some European kingdom, where he had worked in the royal grounds. But coming to America he left his wife behind. Homesickness for his "gude" woman's face soon began to prey on him, and Washington noticed the anxious eye and drooping spirits of his servant. Finally the man went down to the river and declared his intention of shipping to the old country, when who should come up and lean over the side of a newly-arrived vessel but his wife. The kind-hearted general had secretly sent for the woman, and she fortunately suprised her loving husband in one of his fits of despondency.—Philadelphia Times.

Making Rugs by Hand.

The Turkish and Persian rugs which are sold at fancy prices by the carpet men are all made by hand, not even a loom being employed. The work requires great skill and infinite patience, so that the prices for genuine goods are by no means too large. Some of them require the labor of one man for six months or a year before they are completed and put on the market, while the highest-priced rugs, have often been toiled at, day after day, for three or four years before they are finished.

A Good Razor Strop.

There are few better razor strops than can be made from a remnant of old leather belting that has revolved long beneath the dripping of oil from machinery. A razor first stropped on such a strip of leather and then upon a piece of calfskin is easily kept in good order.

The Rock of Refuge.

In Hawaii, one of the Sandwich islands, there is a spot called the Rock of Refuge. If a criminal reaches this rock before capture he is safe, so long as he remains there. Usually his family supply him with food until he is able to make his escape, but he is never allowed to return to his own tribe.

Our Large Tobacco Growth.

Tobacco was discovered in 1492. In 1892 the United States raised 565,755,000 pounds on 757,526 acres of ground. In 1884 the world's production was 768,000 tons on 2,029,000 acres. In 1892 there were manufactured in this country 2,877,779,440 cigarettes.

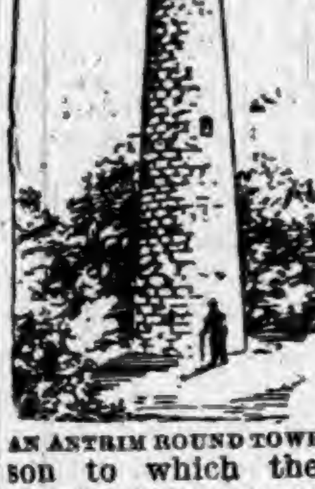
WONDERS OF NATURE.

GRAND AND IMPRESSIVE SCENERY IN IRELAND.

Few Places in the World Are Comparable in Wild and Rugged Grandeur with Portions of the Coast of County Antrim.

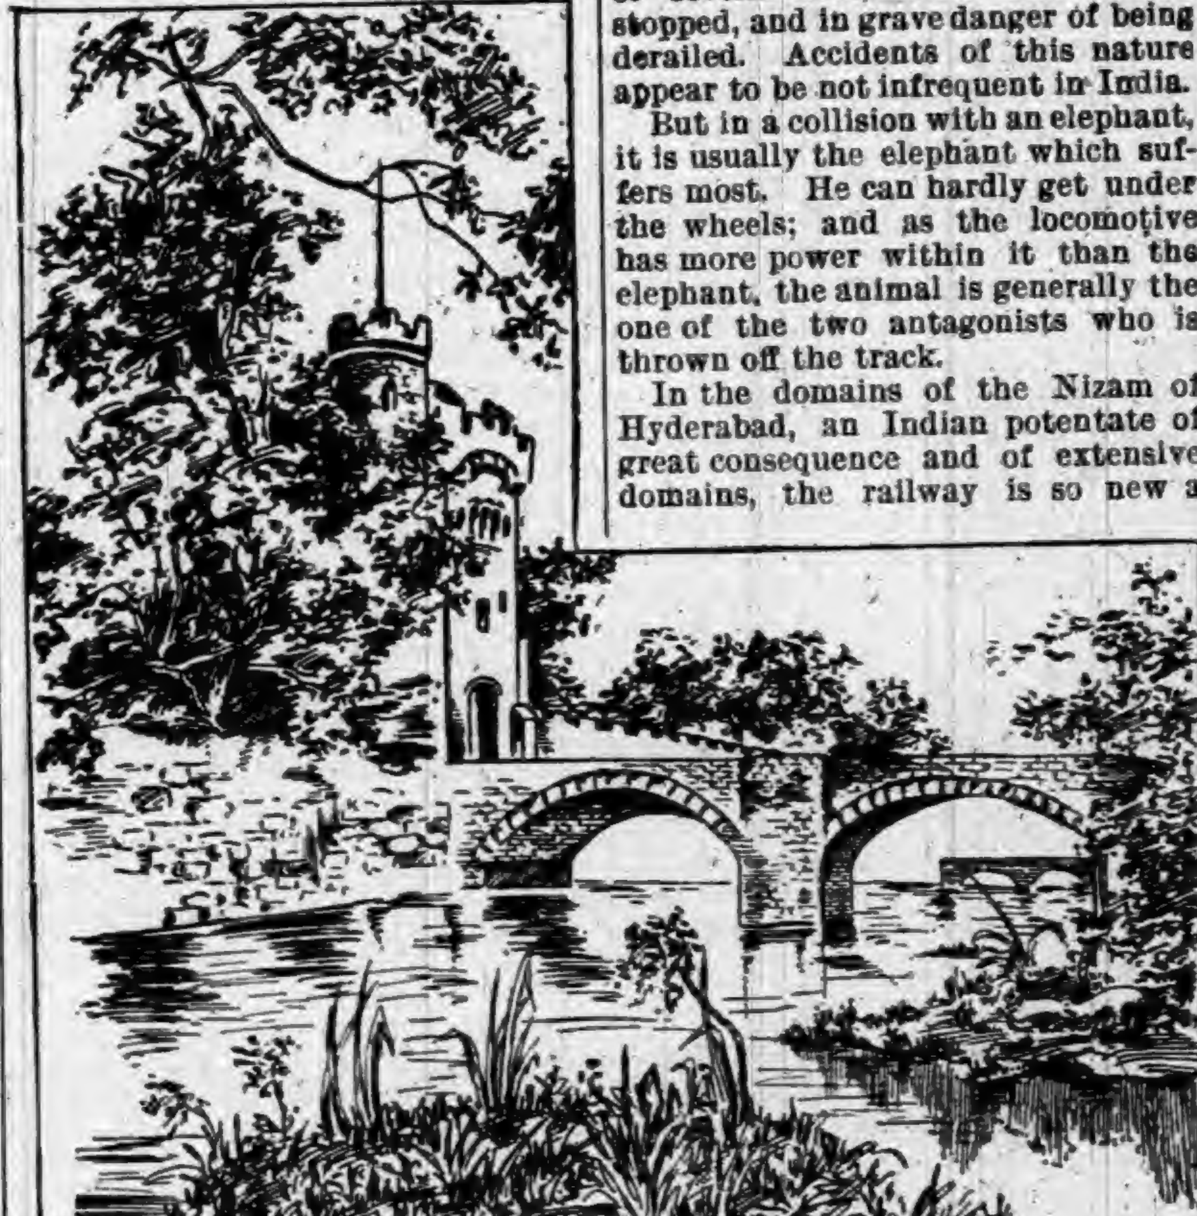
In the Green Isle.

For wild and rugged beauty and grandeur and impressiveness of scenery few places in the world are comparable with that portion of the coast of County Antrim, Ireland, which lies between Fairhead and Portrush. The promontory of Fairhead is grand in the extreme. It is composed of a range of enormous basaltic pillars, 283 feet high, resting on a base which makes the whole altitude 636 feet. The precipice, towering majestic over an awful waste of broken columns, presents to the spectator, says Dr. Drummond, the most stupendous colonnade ever erected by nature and in comparison to which the proudest monuments of human architecture are but the efforts of pigmy imbecility to the omnipotence of God.



AN ANTRIM ROUND TOWER.

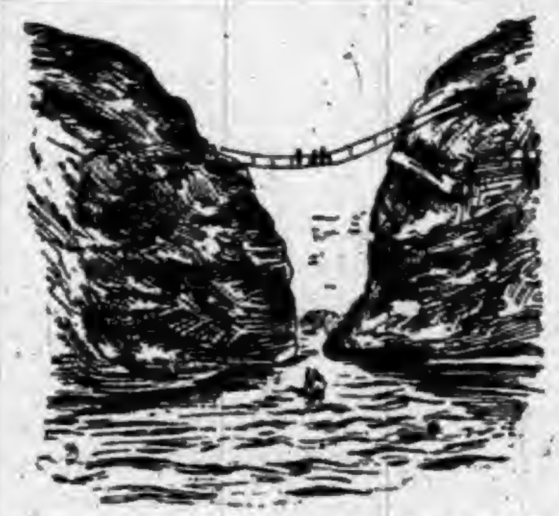
Near the little village of Ballintoy is the picturesque hanging bridge of Carrick-a-rede. It is a rope bridge thrown across a wild chasm in the rocks, through which the waves dash and foam in wildest fury. The chasm is sixty feet deep and the rock on either side rises to a height of eighty feet from the surface of the water.



ENTRANCE GATEWAY, GLENARM CASTLE, COUNTY ANTRIM.

Near the small town of Antrim stands one of the most remarkable of the ancient round towers, ninety-three feet high and fifty-three feet in circumference, upon which much learned research has been spent.

But the Giants' Causeway, a term applied to a small portion of the eight miles of basaltic cliffs between Fairhead and Portrush, is the grandest sight on the coast. It is a platform of basalt, composed of closely arranged columns, ranging from fifteen to thirty-six feet in height. The platform extends from a steep cliff down into the sea until it is lost below low water mark. It is exposed for 300 yards and exhibits an unequal pavement formed of the top of polygonal columns. Each column is divided by joints of unequal length, the concave hollow at the end of one division fitting exactly into the convex projection of the other and so closely that a knife blade cannot be inserted between them. The causeway is divided into the Little, Middle, and Grand Causeway. The Grand Causeway, is about thirty feet wide and runs more than 200 yards from its exposure on the cliff till it is covered by the sea.



THE ROPE BRIDGE OF CARRICK-A-REDE.

A Nice Sort of a Tramp.

"There was the nicest tramp along here to-day," said Mrs. Highland Parke to her husband, at supper last night. "He wasn't a bit like the ordinary tramps, all dirty and with a lot of matted hair on his face, and a red nose and bleary eyes and all that sort of thing. Of course, his clothes weren't very good, but he was clean, and he was so polite."

"What did he want?" asked Mr. Highland Parke, as he covered his tea biscuit with honey.

"Something to eat, but he didn't demand it as his right, as most of those fellows do. He told me that he had been out of work for a long time and, on account of the stringency of currency, he was unable to get a job. He said he had consumption—galloping consumption—and he had a fearful cough, and while he was talking to me he took his hat off and used good grammar and looked so pitiful that I offered him a meal. He wouldn't consent to take it unless I would let him do something for it, and, even when I told him that he was too weak to work, he insisted on doing something. He asked me if we didn't want the lawn mowed and, when I said we did, he insisted on mowing it. I watched him for a while and he did a pretty good job, I guess."

"Hum," said Mr. Highland Parke, as he spread more honey on another tea biscuit, "he was an extraordinary tramp, that's a fact. I guess I'll go out and see what sort of a job he did on the lawn."

In a few minutes Mr. Highland Parke returned with an ominous look in his face.

"He was, indeed, a very nice tramp," said he, in a peculiar tone of voice.

"Why, Highland!" exclaimed Mrs. Parke. "What on earth is the matter? Didn't he cut the grass?"

"Oh, yes; he cut the grass."

"Well, don't you think he was a pretty nice sort of a tramp?"

"Must have been. He stole the lawnmower."—Buffalo Express.

ELEPHANTS AND RAILWAYS.

Natives of India Have a Prejudice Against the Iron Horse.

Not a few people in India have decided objections to the railways, which in recent years have been introduced in that country. Among these objectors are the elephants, to whom railway travel seems to be especially hazardous. More than one elephant, even on the American continent, where elephants are scarce, has been killed by collision with a train. The most famous of all elephants, the great Jumbo, met his death in this way.

The Indian locomotives are more in danger of grasshoppers, it appears, than they are of elephants. When a train runs into a great army of grasshoppers covering the track to a depth of several feet, it is sure to be stopped, and in grave danger of being derailed. Accidents of this nature appear to be not infrequent in India.

But in a collision with an elephant, it is usually the elephant which suffers most. He can hardly get under the wheels; and as the locomotive has more power within it than the elephant, the animal is generally the one of the two antagonists who is thrown off the track.

In the domains of the Nizam of Hyderabad, an Indian potentate of great consequence and of extensive domains, the railway is so new a thing that the people are not yet accustomed to it. Not long ago the Nizam, having occasion to make a journey, preferred to travel by a special train instead of on elephant-back, but he sent his elephants on before him, over the highway.

As the mahout, or elephant-driver in charge of the herd, was proceeding on his way, he came to the intersection of the railway with the public road. As it made a short cut, and was level and smooth, while the road was bad, the elephant driver thought he would take the railway. So he conducted his animals upon the embankment, and they went lumbering on over the rails and ties.

Presently the Nizam's special train came whirling round the curve. The engine-driver saw the elephants, and reversed his lever and gave the signal; but an elephant is a slow animal to move. By the time the astonished mahout had began to deliver his orders to the elephants to get off the track, the train was upon him.

The largest elephant in the company, said to be without a rival in India, was overthrown, crushed and killed. His mahout was also killed. Another elephant lost his trunk, and another one of his tusks, while several more were badly damaged.

The Nizam was a sorrowful witness of this destruction. He wept with grief, and is said to have lamented the introduction of railways into his dominions. The unfortunate man who was the cause of the disaster lost his life as the penalty of the offense of traveling on elephant-back on a railway track.

The Dairy.

Butter statistics are surprising. The census returned show the enormous aggregate of 600,000 tons, or 1,200,000,000 pounds, manufactured in the United States in 1890; and the quantity has probably increased since. How much of all this was oleomargarine, sold under the name of butter, it is now getting a little late in the day to inquire. But the the returns are professedly all of genuine butter, and this may be the fact. It is said that the 1890 product in this country would require 1,000 freight trains of 30 cars each, and each carrying 20 tons, to transport it. Iowa seems to be the largest butter producer—her return, three years ago, being a hundred million pounds (100,000,000), worth $21,000,000. Illinois stood next, with 95,000,000 worth $20,000,000. Wisconsin's product was 45,000,000 pounds, worth $9,000,000, and Minnesota's nearly as great—hers being worth $8,000,000, while Michigan's was worth $7,500,000. In 1885 the assessed value of cows was $700,000,000—or more than the capital of all the national banks, at that time. Incredible as it may seem, it appears that the annual dairy butter product of the United States exceeds in value that of all of the lumber, wheat and iron combined. That, at any rate, is the statement of a statistician who publishes the results of his figuring. Other dairy statistics, milk, cream, and cheese, also make a big showing.—Hartford Times.

If Senator Peffer wants the train robbers scalped, why doesn't he get the ticket scalpers after them.—Plain Dealer.

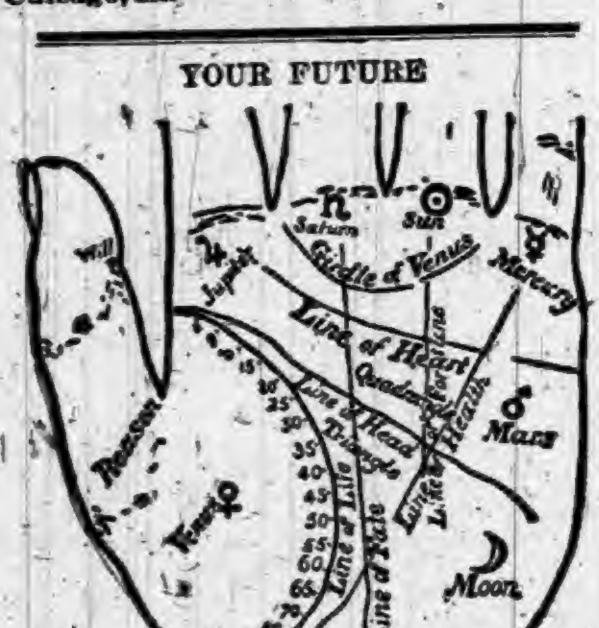
YOUR FUTURE



IS IN YOUR OWN HAND.

Palmistry assumes to tell what the lines in your hand indicate. It will amuse you, if nothing more. The above diagram almost explains itself. The length of the LINE OF LIFE indicates probable age to which you will live. Each BRACELET gives you thirty years. Well-marked LINE OF HEAD denotes brain power; clear LINE OF FORTUNE, fame or riches. Both combined mean success in life; but you must keep up with modern ideas to win it. You will find plenty of these in Demorest's Family Magazine, so attractively presented that every member of the family is entertained. It is a dozen magazines in one. A CLEAR LINE OF HEART bespeaks tenderness; a straight LINE OF FATE, peaceful life; the reverse if crooked. A well-defined LINE OF HEALTH spares you doctors' bills; so will the health hints in Demorest's. No other magazine publishes so many stories to interest the home circle. You will be subject to extremes of high spirits or despondency if you have the GIRDLE OF VENUS well marked; keep up your spirits by having Demorest's Magazine to read. By subscribing to it for 1894 you will receive a gallery of exquisite works of art of great value, besides the superb premium picture, 17x22 inches, "I'm a Daisy!" which is almost a real baby, and equal to the original oil painting which cost $300; and you will have a magazine that cannot be equaled by any in the world for its beautiful illustrations and subject matter, that will keep you posted on all the topics of the day, and all the fads, and different items of interest about the household, besides furnishing interesting reading matter, both grave and gay, for the whole family; and while Demorest's is not a fashion magazine, its fashion pages are perfect, and you get with it, free of cost, all the patterns you wish to use during the year, and in any size you choose. Send in your subscription at once, only $2.00, and you will really get over $25.00 in value. Address the publisher, W. Jennings Demorest, 15 East 14th St., New York. If you are unacquainted with the Magazine, send for a specimen copy. A large QUADRANGLE means honesty; a large TRIANGLE, generosity; long FIRST DIVISION OF THUMB, strong will; LONG SECOND DIVISION, reasoning faculty. The MOUNT OF JUPITER betokens ambition; that of SATURN, prudence; the SUN, love of splendor; MARS, courage; MOON, imagination; VENUS, love of pleasure; and MERCURY, intelligence. Take our advice as above and you will be sure to possess the last and most valuable quality.

His Ideal Keeley Cure.

Several second hand Keeley Cures have been brought out since the original one started at Dwight, Ill., and have been worked with more or less success mostly less. But it was reserved for a DeKalb man, as usual, to get up something original. A short time ago, a man who hails from Concord township, came up to town and got full. Then it occurred to him that he ought to reform and take the Keeley cure, the only cure for drinking that has ever amounted to much. So he wandered off down West Seventh street, and to the Institute. He went in where he was received with the politeness and consideration always shown by the officers in charge, Mr. Putt, Mr. Byrider and Dr. Carver. He looked around with a critic's eye, and watched proceedings with the air of a person who had a vital interest in the matter. He gave the gentlemen in charge, to understand that he intended to brace up and put himself in better shape than he was just then, in short he would put himself into their hands,—not just then however. He had to put in quite a lot of wheat yet and when that was done, they could look for his return for treatment. Soon after this he went home. A few days later he came up to town, bought a jug of whisky and got a few cents worth of chalk, or some similar harmless stuff and took it home. He informed his people that he was going to take the Keeley cure, and take it at home, that this was the outfit the Keeley doctors had furnished him. He said he was instructed to take the medicine and also continue to drink all the whisky he wanted. And this he proceeded to do in great style. Days wore on, and he did not seem to show any signs of improvement, and then his father began to get uneasy, and came to town, and went to the Keeley Institute for more light. There he told the officers that his son was taking their treatment but kept getting drunker and drunker, having been full for a week, and though he was taking the medicine including the whisky, according to directions, it was evidently working the wrong way. He was greatly surprised, when informed that the officials at the institute knew nothing of the matter, had given his son no medicine nor any whisky nor any directions about taking either. A light dawned on the man. His son had taken this mean plan to have a week's unlimited drunk. We can assure our Concord friend that the Keeley Institute cures and will cure his son; but it don't act that way.

KNEW HIS FATHER WELL.

Judge VanFleet's Bad Break at Goshen

[Albion New Era.]

An amusing incident occurred over at Goshen, in the circuit court, which a correspondent to the Indianapolis Journal details as follows:

"The jail is crowded almost beyond its capacity, and among the inmates up to yesterday was a young man named Wishart, who was in for a misdemeanor of considerable importance. During court yesterday Judge VanFleet instructed Deputy Sheriff Kidder to bring in Wishart, which the deputy proceeded to do. He soon reappeared with a young man whom the Judge and everybody else supposed was the prisoner desired. The young man was told to arise, which he did, and, after the usual legal formalities, the Judge sentenced him to the penitentiary for three years, but suspended sentence during good behavior. He then lectured the young man, severely pointing out the error of his ways, and among other things said: "I know your father well and he is a good man," to which the prisoner bowed in acquiescence and gulped down a sob. He was then told he was at liberty to depart, and after a parting admonition from the Judge he did so with an activity and effectiveness that have since kept his whereabouts from being discovered. Soon after this dismissal it was found that young Wishart was still in jail, and that the fellow who had been turned out was a barber who was serving a sentence for murderously assaulting his wife. Wishart was turned loose, the barber remains at large, and whenever anyone looks Kidder in the eye and says, 'I know your father. He is a good man.' Sheriff Kidder drops his head and slides out of sight. The Judge says nothing."

As the Noble county jail is tenanted to its fullest capacity, to avoid a similar blunder here we suggest to Sheriff Shauck that he go through his "herd" with a branding iron, putting a mark upon each of his boarders so that he'll know "who's who."

THE AUBURN COURIER

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY.

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

THURSDAY.......OCTOBER 26, 1893.

REPEAL WILL PASS.

Silver senators are beaten, and the delay in reaching a vote in the senate is about over. A vote may be taken today, and no doubt will result in the unconditional repeal of the purchase clause of the Sherman Act. This result is brought about by the decision of democratic silver senators not to help the republican silver senators any longer to prevent a vote in the senate. They say democrats should be harmonious. The country will say, Amen. Cleveland may be an extremist, but the people believe him honest. It is a sort of victory for him.

THE postoffice department has notified the postmaster at Laporte that the name of that town will hereafter be spelled with a small "p," and not a capital. In other words "Laporte," and not "La Porte." But there is nothing new in all this. The former spelling has generally been used by the people of that region, from the early days to the present.

WHILE we are hunting up medicine to cure hard times, why not kick out the "protective tariff steal?" We have been running that fraud for about a generation, and times have kept getting worse. "Protecting" one man at the expense of a hundred don't make the community rich. There is only about so much money in the country, and only about so much profit in handling that money. If one man has it all, there will be less business activity and less profits on the same sum of money, than if the money was more equally divided.

Farmers, Plant Plums.

C. P. Houser is delivering fruit trees now. We feel particularly interested in the growing of plums, which have proved such a success for the past year or two. Mr. Houser sold all his crop this year at $4 a bushel and could have sold any amount. He had two young trees that had been planted but two years and were five years only from the graft, that each bore a half bushel. He has a lot of plum trees for sale, grafted on plum stocks, which are always much better than those grafted on peach stocks, as some are. They do better, are hardier and bear better. His experience, and that of many others, is that plums are the easiest to raise and the most sure and most profitable of any fruit. They are saved by merely spraying the trees two or three times. Everyone who has the ground should raise plums.

Court.

This has been a busy term and much has been done. New cases are still appearing. One of the latest is the divorce of Alice and Joseph Lower, she getting the custody of a minor child. There was a case brought against Milo Calkin by Frank Borst, and Marion Franks was appointed receiver for Calkin, who seems to be somehow involved. Franks gave bonds in $5000 with L. J. Miller on his bond. Isaac Dirrim was made guardian for James Dirrim, on application by Fred. D. Oberlin. The case of C. Q. Boyer against his former wife, Mary Boyer, for custody of children, was dismissed, and the children will very properly be left with their mother, who is caring for them very intelligently. The case of state vs Dennis Poorman, larceny, goes to next term. All the Deeters cases will likely go to next term. The ditch case between Kelley and Kennedy is expected to come on the latter part of this week. The case of Eliza McConnell at Angola, injunction to keep the town from opening a street through her property, is concluded. The injunction is withdrawn and we suppose the street can be opened. The case between Weidner and Oberholzer has been opened up and will be tried next term, with J. A. Woodhull as special judge. Jennie and Orrin Bristol were divorced. In the case for partition of property brought by Rachel Euzor, Wesley Showalter, Elias Kiplinger and Talma Rummel will make the partition and report next term.

The case of Sylvester Likens vs Lake Shore road has been on some days. It will be remembered that about a year ago, one morning while the yard men at Butler were gathering up the lanterns used over night, they being on a hand car, saw suddenly the fast train coming. It threw off a mail sack, which fell under the wheels, and then the hind coach's last trucks ran off onto another track. They saw this flying towards them sidewise, and had just time to jump and dive under a freight car, when the wreck of their smashed hand car was hurled after them. The only one much hurt was Likens, whose arm was crushed. He is suing for damages. This case is still going on. The Barth ditch case is also nearly finished. Some important new cases are coming up. One in which Geo. Boots, of Butler wants a divorce from his wife, and another in which he sues W. D. Miller of that place for $10,000 damages for alienating his wife's affections. Another new case is that between D. S. Ober and his sisters, they suing him to compell him to live up to an agreement to pay a certain sum each year for the support of his mother. This contract, it appears he refuses to observe and he now files a schedule to prevent its collection. The prominence of all these parties will call up considerable interest. Judge McClellan has several of the cases, but we did not learn who the other attorneys are. The printed bar dockets ought to contain the names of attorneys in the case.

The case of Little vs Husselman was tried last week at Albion, with a man named Vail from Goshen on the bench, and a jury. It was a case well known to the people here and should have been tried here where the standing of both parties is well known. For the benefit of any who do not know what the case was we give a very brief statement.

The Garrett Clipper, edited by Hank Little and owned we believe by Jack, has been for years maligning and traducing people all about it, and especially people in Auburn. Several of our best citizens have tried to get them to stop this disgraceful course and be decent. But they would not. Several have threatened them with punishment and two or three have caught Hank and given him a shaking up. In each case he would let up on the man who shook him, for he is an arrant coward as well as a confirmed blackguard. Our people have suffered this dirty abuse till they lost patience. Among the number the Clipper had singled out for its attack was Cal Husselman. At different times they had put their nose into his private affairs. At last in June of last year they came out in a matter that was none of their business, and in this was the statement that Husselman's farm was mortgaged and that he was a financial failure, etc, etc. Husselman says the charge was not true, but true or not, no decent paper would have published such a thing. Smarting under the attack Husselman came to town and hunted up Hank Little and found him on the street just bracing up after a two weeks' drunk, a thing he frequently indulged in. He proceeded to thrash him severely with a raw hide. For this he was taken before a justice and fined $12 and costs. While all admit the whipping was too severe, the better part of the people agreed that Hank needed a licking and hoped it would prevent his abusing decent people through his paper from that time on. It had this effect to a certain extent, but the paper soon got back into its old disreputable ways. Hank himself kept sober for more than a year, and it was only about a month ago that he went on another two weeks' bum. In the meantime a case for civil damages for $1,000 had been brought up in the circuit court against Husselman. But it was afterwards taken to Albion, then from there to Columbia City, then taken back to Albion again. Last week it was tried before a man named Vail from Goshen. Judge Adair for some reason we do not understand, gave up the job to Vail. The substance of the testimony we give elsewhere. The evidence even of the plaintiff and his witnesses went to show that every step taken had in view the size of the cash pile they could get out of the case. There was but little for the defense to do, as no chance was given them to introduce any evidence to prove the low character of the paper that had caused the trouble nor the very unsavory character of the plaintiff himself All this could have been easily shown, we suppose, but it was soon evident that it would not be allowed. Perhaps the rules that prevail in law trials would prevent this. But that makes more forcible our assertion that the case should have been tried here where both parties were known. The records of our courts show that Hank Little has been hauled up a number of times and fined for drunkenness and such like offenses, and he had in many ways become a by word and a stench among the people in Auburn. However, while our people thought that so severe a thrashing as he got was worth perhaps something, say $50 or $100 to pay an extreme price for loss of time, or doctors' bills, yet no one was prepared to hear that a jury had given him $775 damages. Yet that was what a Noble county jury did. It is properly considered here as an outrage, and the best of our people condemn it in no very flattering terms. This verdict would seem to indicate that a scurrilous paper filled weekly with abusive slush by a habitual drunkard can attack with impunity the best citizens and the best interests of a community and be allowed to go unpunished. We can count twenty or more reputable persons who have been subjected to these abusive attacks. It may be said, "Why not take the law on Hank or on the paper he edits?" The reply is that Hank is not worth anything and no one could get civil damages. If one would make a criminal case of it we suppose he would swear as he did in this case, that he did not write the article. How then, is the community to be protected? The verdict of the jury at Albion is an outrage. It will do to go with the two others we mention at the head of this article. It is such things as these that bring our courts in o disrepute, and have made lynch law and white capism possible. The one who has most cause to be pleased with the trial is Judge McClellan, who with very little assistance won a weak cause against three able attorneys.

THE TRIAL.

The trial had been taken to Albion on change of venue, and even there, the regular judge, Mr. Adair, got out of the way, and had a young man named Vail, from Goshen, to preside. The plaintiff, Hank Little had for his attorneys, Judge McClellan of this place and Robert Barr of Kendallville. Husselman's attorneys were John W. Baxter of Auburn and H. C. Peterson and H. G. Zimmerman, of Albion. The first witness called was the plaintiff, who was sworn. He told in the main, the same story that he told in the trial before justice Walborn. This was in effect that after a drinking spree of a week or two he was going to the saloon for another drink to "taper off on." He said he may have taken two drinks that morning and 10 to 15 in all during the day, but was not certain. When Husselman called to him to stop, he did so, and when Husselman came up, he did not know him. Cal. caught him by the throat and choked him so he could not speak then hit him a few times with rawhide then stopped and asked if he knew him, Hank, this time said he did. Then Cal. struck him several more blows. Hank went home told his wife what had happened, then went over to Frank Joliff's and then up town to Garwood's office, then to Hartman's office at each place stripping his clothes enough to to show his back. He next went to Rice's gallery to have a photo taken, as Mr. Moody had advised him to have this done. From there he went to Squire Walborn's office and swore out a warrant against Husselman. Then he went home. He and his friends testified that on a part of this journey he had assistance in getting along. Then Dr. Allen and Dr. Nusbaum came and treated him, and two days later Dr. Wood, of Garrett, was sent over. Chris Baker was employed as nurse.

Hank's testimony was not calculated to impress an ordinary jury very favorably. He was trying to get all the money out of the job he could yet testified "I was in bed about one week." "Was able to walk up town next week to the trial," after saying he was not able to even write for some time, admitted that he did write a part of the following week "June 23rd." Peterson had some fun with him about "taking 15 drinks to taper off on." Hank gave as one reason he did not know Husselman at first, that he could not see well at the time. He swore "My eyesight is usually affected when I am in liquor." Then he went on to explain about the trouble he had with the fair at Auburn, when the officers of association ordered Husselman who was the secretary, to take up the complimentary tickets that had been issued to the Clipper. (This had been done because the Clipper had been fighting the fair, but as it was not Husselman's doings, it had no bearing on this case.) Mrs. Little testified to his coming home and telling her he had been whipped. She testified also as to his previous condition and that he was weak at the time. "When my husband drinks, he don't eat much. He had been sleeping that afternoon." She repeated what had already been said, that several doctors were called, and that Chris Baker helped to wait on him, and that he did not work any for two or three weeks. She testified as Hank had, that he had on at the time of the whipping an "outing" shirt, and an undershirt. "Both shirts were cut, the undershirt the most." She was asked if they had sent for the shirts, to be used at the trial—replied "I have tried to send for them," On cross examination, she admitted that Hank may have asked "where is my revolver.' She said she would "like to make an additional statement in regard to the matter," but counsel would not allow more. Dr. Wood testified that he found Hank weak and nervous on Monday, and that there were signs of injury to one thumb and a finger, and thought there might be danger of blood poisoning. He charges $5 for a consultation fee, as in this case. Later on a deposition from Dr. Allen was read, in which he stated the same price. Also a deposition from Dr. Nusbaum who said he charged $10 for the same thing. D. D. Moody was sworn, and gave about the same as the others, except that it was he that suggested to Hank to get the photo taken, A. J. Little and Frank Joliff gave nothing new. The affidavit of Rice, the photographer, was to effect that the picture was genuine. The picture was passed around to the jury. Chris Baker gave some new matter. He testified he was called in as a nurse, and waited on Hank several nights and that his services for the same were worth $10. On cross examination, said he was nurse for Hank several nights and that it was worth $1 to $1.50 a night. He finally said he had put in three or four nights and at last stuck to only three nights, leaving each night at twelve o'clock, but could not give a very good account of how three nights at $1 would come to $10. There was all the way through an evident effort by the plaintiff and his witnesses to run up as big a bill of all kinds as possible, with the view of getting as big damages as possible. The only other new matter, was that in the testimony of Ollie Robbins. He said he was asleep at home when the whipping took place and as it was near enough so he could see a part of what was going on he tried to get out to go to Hank's assistance, but could not as the door was fastened. After awhile he was let out. He gave as a reason why he was kept in, and why he was not allowed to get his revolver after being let out that his folks knew if he got out and got his gun, "Husselman would not now be here on this trial." He also described agout going up town with Hank, and thought his back was not washed before the photo was taken, at least he did not know as it had been. On returning home, several were with him and Hank till they reached Fred Yesbera's residence, where the rest all left and he took Hank home alone.

We have thus given but a brief part of the testimony of the plaintiff, mainly that which had not already been published. The defendant, Cal. Husselman took the stand and his testimony brought out nothing new, being about the same as he gave at the trial before Justice Walborn. He denied choking Hank or saying anything about shooting. Said he caught Hank by the shirt, not by the throat, Sylvester Kutzner, county assessor, sworn. Had lived in same school district with Husselman ever since the latter was born. Husselman had a good reputation, and was not quarrelsome. J. A. Barns, of the Auburn COURIER was put on the stand and asked as to the value of a man's services as editor and writer of a paper, Said that depended on circumstances. Was stopped by counsel for plaintiff and requested to give a definite answer. Witness insisted his right to have a definite question, and this was finally given. Asked how much Hank's services as an editor were worth, answered "I would not give him anything." On cross examination, this witness admitted Hank had worked for him some year ago, and he had paid him for it, and after some cross firing by attorneys, was asked how much a man of Hank's habits would be worth as a printer. Answered "not much, as he might be sober and do a good day's work Monday and Tuesday, but on Wednesday and Thursday when the paper must be issued he might be drunk, at a time when most needed." We suppose these points were looked up, with a view to finding the proper amount of damages to which Hank would be entitled for loss of time, etc. Next day Husselman was on the stand again. Dr. Hays and Dr. Green, of Albion, as had Dr. Swartz, of Auburn, said Hank's condition might have been the result of hard drink, rather than of the flogging. J. J. Lash former editor of the Albion Democrat was called. Hank had worked for him about four weeks some years ago, and he had discharged him, because he did not like his style of running a paper, but the Judge would not allow Lash to testify, as that was a matter that had happened some years ago.

As far as we know, there was no attempt made to introduce testimony to prove the disreputable character of the Clipper or the low plane on which it is conducted, In fact, there seem but little chance to do anything for the defense, as his attorneys were generally shut off by the "umpire" as would be said in a ball game. Comments on this trial are in another article.

A Cracked Hogshead.

Sheriff Ralston had a new experience Monday evening. A young man named Wm. Hogshead got it into his head that his best girl, who is an employe at the Glazier House, did not love him as much as he loved her and he determined to have her or her heart's blood. The young lady became frightened and ran to the sheriff's residence for protection. The sheriff took the young man back to Jas. Griswold's where he boards and escorted the girl back to the Glazier House. But soon after the fellow came up again, swearing that if he could not marry the girl, no one else should. He had tried to borrow a razor to help him out in his work The sheriff locked him up over night, and sent him off the next morning with a few choice blessings of the kind one don't hear in church. We have not heard from Hogshead since.

While at Albion last week, we enjoyed the full measure of the hospitality of Jay Martin and family, and met Elza Shaffer, and renewed many more old time acquaintances, among them being Judge Adair, Nelson Prentiss, Sheriff Shank, Mr. Eagles, Dr. Lemon, Dr. Hays and many more. Dr. Hays placed us under especial obligations by inviting us down to his fine residence, where we whiled away the otherwise long hours till train time, most pleasantly. And we were not sent away hungry, for his estimable wife and daughter very thoughtful as well as gracefully, set out as nice a lunch as a hungry traveler would wish to enjoy. We do not wish to convey the idea that this was all done for "us" alone, for Dr. Swarts, an old friend of Dr. Hays, was along, as well as Assessor Kutzner, Prof. W. H. McIntosh, and Cal. Husselman. It was a pleasant sample of Albion's well known hospitality, and if Dr. Hays, or his charming wife and daughter ever come to Auburn they will find several hearty welcomes waiting them.

G. M. Scott, of Larwill, was here last week on his way to attend the reunion at Angola, of the 44th veterans, of which he was a member. He is one of the men who served through the war, and can for some reason only get a pension of $6 a month, and this was for a gunshot wound. Some men who only served a few months get big pensions. Something is wrong.

Hoodlums are making wreck of the buildings on the fair ground, tearing off doors and breaking windows. Our experience is that even parties working horses on the grounds do not hesitate to knock off a door, when they find that plan the easiest. Of course the windows are broken by boys. The buildings on the grounds here are the best on any fairground in the state, but they will not last long at the present rate.

J. A. Potter and Will Garver went up to the creek east of the J. C. St. Clair home last Wednesday to fish, as they had been told by the Dennisons that it was along there they would find the best chances to get at the carp they had turned out of Carp lake into the creek. It proved true. That day the two caught eighty-four, and on Thursday, 180, all good fish, part of them being German carp, and the rest of them various kinds of native fish. They said the fish would bite as fast as a line was thrown in.

Uncle Henry Shull reached home Monday evening after a summer spent with his children, Josiah and Rebecca, in Philipsburg, Montana. He reached home in good shape and in the best of spirits, and brings word that all are doing well out there. It is a mountainous country and snow is always in sight on the higher points. They have had snow there in the settled parts already. He says he put in the summer very pleasantly, and got sufficiently acquainted to feel very much at home. He says being errand boy is all the work he had to do, and now in his absence, Auntie Ryan will miss him to go to the postoffice. He thinks of going to the Pacific to see Daniel next year, but will spend the winter with Peter at the old DeKalb home.

Charley Crew is engaged in selling some excellent medicines, especially the "Malena Blood Tablets," for the purification of the blood, and for diseases arising from an impure condition of the blood. Mr. Crew is disabled by the terrible accident in his mill, so he cannot work, and we think our people who need such remedies would be doing a graceful thing to give him their patronage.

Chris. Fell brought in a beautiful specimen of a chrysalis yesterday. He found it attached to a blade of corn in Dr. Casebeer's field. It shows the wonderful instinct that enables the lowest animals to prepare for the new life on which they will enter next year as butterflies and other insects. This one shows the outline of wings, feet, head, etc., of the coming form, all made beautiful, and even trimmed at the points with gold. It is a beauty.

For the first time the women of Connecticut have taken part in the elections for school boards. Of the 327 women who registered 264 voted. Most of the voting women were of old New England families, the foreigners taking no part in the innovation. In one family five women voted and no two of the tickets were alike.

Louise de la Ramee, more widely known as "Ouida," has told how she gets her knowledge of the language and habits of men about town, which is displayed in her novels. She invites young gentlemen of sporting proclivities to dine with her, and when the meal is over she tells them to talk, smoke and drink just as if they were at their clubs. They usually comply with the request, and she thus gathers a store of more or less edifying anecdotes, risky stories and double ententes for her next book.

St. Helena is again the prison of royalty. Dinizul, the son and heir of Cetewayo, the Zulu king, and Undabuko, brother of the same monarch, are kept in captivity there by the British. Owing to the climate, which is much more severe than that of South Africa, the two Zulus have to wear blankets or some other heavy covering all the time. Their health is bad, and it is not believed that they will ever leave their island prison alive. The English Government probably does not intend that they shall.

Alexander Zederbaum, who has just died at St. Petersburg, was the editor of a remarkable newspaper, the Hamelitz. It is a daily paper printed in classical Hebrew, stock reports, money market, political news, and all. Zederbaum was born in Poland and was originally a tailor. He educated himself, and having acquired some money, started the Hamelitz as a weekly. Ten years ago it became a daily, and as its circulation was over all Europe among the Jews, its proprietor made a fortune.

The "pet name" is disappearing from the face of the earth. In a large hotel this summer, where there were a large number of children, there were Daniels, Samuels, Marthas and Emelines, without one "ie" in them all. The antiquated titles of the first half of the century are resurrected again as in this case, and no attempt to soften them. The Eloises and Leilas and Mauds are likewise dying out. It will not be long, at this rate, before one can tell a body's age by the name he bears, they belong so completely to periods.

Many a failure could be averted by not being in too great a hurry to establish a business. The best way is to start a business in the most most modest way, on the creep-before-you-walk plan, and not be in a hurry to become a merchant prince. If you make a thousand dollars clear profit the first year, live closely and frugally, regulate closely every expense connected with your business, and put every dollar of that thousand that you can spare right back into your business. Don't put it into clerks and assistants, but into stock. Work like a demon yourself, and do with as little help as possible.

Canon Fisher, of Bournemouth, England, is violently opposed to Sunday newspapers. He has been complaining of the tendency of these ungodly journals to keep people away from church, and adds that "the sea and cliffs are tempting enough to keep many persons from divine service, and we do not want the Sunday papers to increase the temptation." This deliverance prompts Mr. Labouchere to remark in Truth that the case is a hard one. "Against God Almighty and the newspapers combined," he asks, "how can even the most eloquent dignitaries of the church hope to hold their own?"

Young and growing persons should not use tobacco in any form. The use of cigarettes by boys cannot be too severely condemned. Here is what an eminent medical man says on the subject: "The evils of tobacco are intensified a hundred-fold upon the young. Here it is unqualifiedly and uniformly injurious. It stunts the growth, poisons the heart, impairs the mental powers, and cripples the individual in every way. No boy can begin the practice of smoking without becoming physically, mentally and morally injured by the time he is 21. Sewer gas is bad enough, but a boy had better learn his Latin over a man-trap than get the habit of smoking cigarettes."

There has been talk from time to time of the clubs of New York taking the reform in hand and setting the example of giving no tips, but they have done nothing. The average man takes the line of least resistance, hates to be considered mean, and falls in with the social habits of his environment. It is useless to look for action on the part of receivers of tips, though in reality they suffer pecuniarily by the custom. Moreover, they are hurt in character and standing, since the tip, being a gratuity in form, reduces them from the position of self-respecting, wage-earning workers to the status of takers of alms. But apparent individual interest outweighs all such considerations, and, besides, concert of action among waiters and other servants of a whole country is not to be expected. The remedy lies only in a growth of public opinion that will make the giving and the acceptance of tips equally discreditable. And the tip is discreditable, since it renders the receiver less of a man and the bestower less of an American.

Says the Chicago Herald: There is every reason to believe that some one has been trifling with Emigration Commissioner Senner, of New York. He has received a letter purporting to come from a Chicago man, who declares that he wishes to be put in communication with some immigrant girl, with a view to marriage. This letter, if genuine, would indicate that there are in Chicago no girls worth marrying. Such a proposition is, of course, ridiculous and insulting. Chicago girls are known far and wide for their wit, their intelligence, and their good looks. They are, indeed, the greatest glory of the city. Their accomplishments are not limited to the fashionable arts. They have been brought up practically. They can not only play the piano, but they can cook a dinner. They are equally at home discussing the music of the future and sewing on shirt buttons. They are healthy, handsome damsels, with lungs expanded by the air of the prairies, and with intellects broadened by liberal education. They are, as a matter of fact, and to put it plainly, world-beaters, and no man in his senses would go to New York or anywhere else to look for a wife after seeing the modest yet independent maidens of this town. Some one is having fun with Mr. Senner.

ABSURD STATEMENTS.

SOME THAT ARE MADE BY M'KINLEY IN OHIO.

He Would Stop Trade and Make Hermits and Barbarians of Us All—Graduation in Income Taxes—Labor Cost the Only Test.

Obstructs Progress.

The election in Ohio this year will determine whether or not an idiot asylum should be built around the Governor simply or if it should extend around the whole State. The statements made by the tariff Napoleon can come only from a demagogue, from a fanatic, or from one whose gray matter has gone on a vacation. Take this from his speech at Warren, Ohio: "If I had my way I would not buy one dollar's worth of goods made in Europe so long as there was an idle man in this country." It is reported that this remark met with tremendous applause, though whether the crowd took the Major seriously or not is not stated.

Now the Governor does certainly have his own way as to the goods he purchases, and yet he probably not only wears clothes made of English goods but eats English marmalades and jellies, and drinks French wines from Belgian vessels. His clothes are made from English goods because he had his own way and put a duty on wool which makes it out of the question for our own manufacturers to produce goods with a fine finish, and compete, even with 100 per cent. protection, with their British rivals. He eats English preserves because his protective duties on tin plate, glass, and sugar prevent the establishing here of large canning factories to work up the surplus of small fruits, which must therefore be left to decay at the loss of the fruit farmers and of the millions of wage earners who would be only too glad to eat more of such food, if it were cheaper.

But suppose the Governor does not mean it as pure buncombe, and that he really thinks that God made a mistake in not making an ocean of fire instead of one of water between us and Europe —what is the only logical meaning of such a statement? Is it not that commerce, instead of being the greatest educator and civilizer known, while it at the same time enables man to supply his wants with less exertion, is a curse to mankind? Is it not saying that there is no article but what we can produce cheaper here than it can be produced abroad, no matter what the advantage of soil or climate? Is it not saying that it is a mistake for us to sell our surplus grain, cotton and meats abroad? Is it not clear that if we do not purchase goods of foreigners they cannot purchase of us? And if this principle of non-exchange holds good between nations, why not between States, counties and individuals? If we are not to take advantage of the opportunities and inventions of other nations, States or individuals, what will become of our civilization? Without trade or exchange we will have no use for wagons, cars, boats or ships. Is it the opinion of the Governor of the fourth largest State in this Union that these implements of commerce should be left to decay and our roads and highways allowed to return to the primeval state in which Columbus found them 400 years ago? Would the Major extend his protective system until we are all commercial hermits? Would he then think it wrong for two individuals to exchange ideas so long as each could make an idea of his own?

These absurd conclusions are not only logical deductions from Governor McKinley's statement, but they are in line with his often expressed idea that cheapness is not a blessing. In his opinion the inventions which cheapen production and save human labor are to be feared as we would fear a rattlesnake. At least foreign inventions are extremely dangerous. Thus he stands with both feet on those two mainsprings of civilization and progress—trade and invention—while the populace of Ohio applaud. Is he fooling them? Are they fooling him? Or are they all in the same boat?

McKinley's Protection Panacea.

"What has protection done for us? It has made the youngest country in the world the greatest of them all; and yet they call it robbery," says Gov. McKinley in a burst of exultation. Why not, Major? Hasn't protection made us rich and great by taxing the foreigner, and isn't it robbery to take the property of another without giving something in exchange? But if protection has not made us great by brigandage and piracy, how has it done so —for certainly we are great? Hasn't it made us great by not taking it; that is, by taking less of it than is taken by any other country?

Suppose we had high tariff walls between every State like those between every little country of Europe; would we have attained our present greatness? In no other part of the world is so much trade carried on without tariff restrictions as in this country. We may be thankful that our forefathers decided to abolish forever the "protection" of one State from another by tariffs.

Look what protection has done for Australia! Until a few years ago that young continent was making great progress. The protection mania struck it. Each colony was going to become independent and get rich without the aid, if not at the expense, of its neighbors. In less than two years after each had barricaded against every other colony, there was a crash and Australia's colonies were financial wrecks. Protection is a great remedy, but it should be taken in homeopathic doses to produce the best effects.

Labor Cost the Only Test.

In attempting to show that we must have a tariff duty in order to enable our industries to exist they content themselves with showing a difference in wages per day in favor of our employes, whereas the only test is the labor cost of the article produced. The pay per day is wholly immaterial. The labor cost is material. In most of our industries, while the manufacturers pay higher wages per day they get more work for the same amount of money than foreign manufacturers. There are innumerable instances where our manufacturers compete in foreign markets without protection with the pauper labor of the world, and yet where they persistently demand a tariff, in order to produce goods for sale in this country, where they have the advantage of transportation, even if they had no tariff.—William J. Bryan, in the North American Review.

We Still Have Republican Laws.

Some of the shallow and callow Republican organs throughout the country keep up the campaign pretense that the business depression is due to the result of the last election. Are not tariff and other taxes just as high as the Republicans left them? Is not the Treasury still suffering from the Republican deficiency? Is not the gold reserve just about as "Calico Charlie" left it? What has changed except the incumbency of the higher offices and the purpose of the Government in relation to the wrongs and the evils which the people condemned? Too many partisan journals are conducted on the theory that the people are fools.—New York World.

Graduation in Income Taxes.

Recent Washington dispatches indicate very clearly that the project of an income tax is likely to command a much stronger support, both in the Ways and Means Committee and the House, than has been expected. Properly adjusted, an income tax is an ideal revenue measure. It taxes wealth and not consumption, accumulation instead of industry.

The suggestion of Mr. Whiting, of the Ways and Means Committee, however, if embodied in law, would seriously impair both the productiveness and the ideal justice of the tax. It is his plan to impose the tax at a fixed percentage upon all incomes over $2,000, making the rate no heavier upon a great than upon a small income. But the graduation of rate is of the essence of an income tax, a part of the fundamental idea upon which the tax rests—namely, that men should be taxed according to their ability to pay. A levy of 5 per cent. would mean two very different things to the man with an income of $2,500 and the man with one of $50,000. To the one its payment would involve some deprival of the ordinary comforts and necessaries of life; to the other it would not involve even the sacrifice of luxury, but would mean only some small reduction in annual accumulation. Such a tax would be grossly unfair as a distribution of public burdens and very unsatisfactory as a source of revenue.

An income tax should bear very lightly upon small incomes and more and more heavily as incomes become larger and better able to bear it. That principle is accepted wherever the income tax is a part of a scientific system. It is that principle which excepts very small incomes from all taxation. It is right and just and expedient.—New York World.

The Consumer Pays It.

Under a 50 per cent. duty an article worth $1 is imported, the 50 per cent. duty added, and the consumer buys it for $1.50, plus expenses and profits. This tax is either paid by the foreigner who sells to us, or by the consumer in this country, who finally uses the article. If paid by the foreigner, then in the case above referred to the foreigner reduced his price from $1.50 to $1, so that when the duty is paid the price with the tariff will be the same that it would have been without the tariff. To show the absurdity of this position it is not necessary to inquire why the protectionist advocates such a variety of duties (why not treat all foreign nations alike and subject them to equal duties?), but it is sufficient to say that a tariff which is not paid by the consumer is of no benefit to the protected industry. If the producer of the protected article receives the same price for his goods with or without the tariff, what difference does it make to him whether the duties be high or low? If he cannot compete without the aid of a tariff, how can it help him except by enabling him to charge a higher price for his product? How can he charge a higher price unless he can compel the consumer to pay it? And how can he compel the consumer to pay it unless the tariff increases to the consumer the price of the competing article? The only reasonable or logical purpose of the tariff, therefore, is to compel the consumer to buy at home at a high price by preventing a purchase abroad at a lower price. It is here that the principle of protection violates the right of the individual, and its establishment disregards the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution.—William J. Bryan, in the North American Review.

Congressman McMillin's Plan.

There should be a general revision of the tariff and reduction of duties to a revenue basis. The reduction should be greatest in the necessaries of life, and less on luxuries. So far as may be, raw materials should be made free, that manufacturers may be unhampered in the competition of the world, and goods be supplied at a cheaper cost to our people. The right of the President to impose and remit taxes should be taken away as undemocratic and un-American. Taxes should be substituted for bounties, it being the object of the Government to impose taxes "for revenue" to carry on government; and not to raise money from one citizen to pay to another to increase his profits. Make the tariff what it should be. When this is done, we can regulate our revenue, as we do now, by our internal revenue taxes.

If more money is needed it can be obtained by an increase of the tax on spirits and by such other internal taxes as Congress may in its discretion impose. Among other feasible means is a legacy tax which never makes its exactions till the party who worked for the money no longer needs it—till one is to get it who never earned it. There is no point where Government can with more propriety make a reasonable exaction for that protection through which alone it could have been accumulated, than on large legacies and inheritances.—Benton McMillin, in the North American Review.

McKinleyism Disposed Of.

Whitelaw Reid's idea that the result of election may be mitigated by a petition presented to those who were successful in the polling by those who were beaten, that the whole current of events may be changed, is a novelty. Perhaps Mr. Whitelaw Reid will next propose that a petition be presented to Congress asking that Congress reconsider its finding that Mr. Stevenson was elected Vice President of the United States and proceed to declare that Mr. Whitelaw Reid was really the successful person and therefore must now preside in the Senate.

Just as effectually as the election of 1892 disposed of the ambition of Whitelaw Reid for the Vice Presidency it disposed also of the claim of McKinleyism for further consideration.—Chicago Times.

Pick-Pocket Taxation.

If it is difficult to defend the principle of transferring one man's money to another man's pocket by law, it is equally difficult to defend the policy of such a system. Whenever a legislative body announces that it has opened up business for that purpose, it is at once besieged by those who seek to use the taxing power for private gain.—William J. Bryan, in the North American Review.

A Curious Monument.

A curious monument, with a still more curious epitaph, until recently stood in an English churchyard. It was a Mr. Oswald, and consisted of a marble table which he in life used as a dinner table. The epitaph read: "This marble table, sitting at which I have often cultivated good living (propitiated my tutelar genius), I have desired to be placed over me when dead. Stop, traveler, whoever thou art; here thou mayest recline, and if the means are at hand, mayest enjoy this table as I formerly did. If thou doest so in the right and proper way, thou wilt neither desecrate the monument nor offend me. Farewell. Lived 30 years and died November 28, 1726."

Statistics are said to show that young men do not, on the average, attain full physical maturity until they arrive at the age of 28 years. Prof. Scheiller, of Harvard, asserts, as the result of his observations, that young men do not attain to the full measure of their mental faculties before 25 years of age. A shrewd observer has said that "most men are boys until they are 30, and little boys until they are 25;" and this accords with the standard of manhood, which was fixed at 30 among the ancient Hebrews and other races.

Cute Scheme of Old Tars.

The old tars in the naval home have a new scheme for obtaining at least a part each year of the pension to which they would be entitled if they were not inmates of the Government institution on Gray's Ferry road. By a peculiar twist in the law when an old man-'o-warsman accepts the benefits of the home he is obliged to surrender his pension. A few knowing ones among the veteran salts have found out that this law does not apply to Soldiers' and Sailors' homes in other parts of the country, and they occasionally obtain leave of absence from the naval home and obtain admittance to the home at Hampton, Va., where they remain for a few months at a time. During this period they receive their pension money, and after accumulating $50 or $100 they return to the Gray's Ferry establishment, where they stay until they have spent the cash, and then take another profitable leave of absence.—Philadelphia Record.

The Strongest Defense

Against ill-health, debility and nearvousness is to promote digestion, activity of the liver and regularity of the bowels with the incomparable alterative and tonic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a medicine without a drawback, safe and thorough, and having the highest professional sanction. It promotes an adequate secretion of the gastric juices that act as solvents of the food, and insures its conversion into rich, nourishing blood, which never fails to honor the drafts for strength made upon it by the rest of the system. As a laxative of the bowels it is natural and gentle in operation, but at the same time effective. By directing the bile into its proper channel it removes the many and harassing symptoms of liver complaint. Heartburn, nausea, sick headaches, nervousness, rheumatism, malaria and kidney troubles are remedied by it.

Limited Education in Russia.

The common people of Russia as a rule speak only their own tongue. A large proportion of them cannot read the bewildering characters—Roman, Greek, and composite—which form their alphabet, and to help their ignorance the shop walls are covered over with rudely painted pictures of articles for sale within. The butcher's shop has a picture of meats of all sorts and shapes, the tailor's walls are covered with paintings of coats and trousers. The pills of the apothecary and the vegetables of the green grocer are advertised by pictures upon the doors and windows of their stores.—New York Times.

Atlanta's First Name Was Marthasville.

Atlanta, Ga., was until forty-six years ago known as Marthasville, and the city was incorporated under that name. It was given in honor of Miss Martha Atlanta Lumpkin, the youngest daughter of Governor Lumpkin, who is still living, at the age of 66 years, near Athens, Ga., being now Mrs. Martha Campton. The name Marthasville was changed to Atlanta by the Legislature on the petition of the citizens, and greatly to the disgust of Governor Lumpkin. The fiftieth anniversary of the first incorporation as Marthasville will be celebrated this year.—New York Tribune.

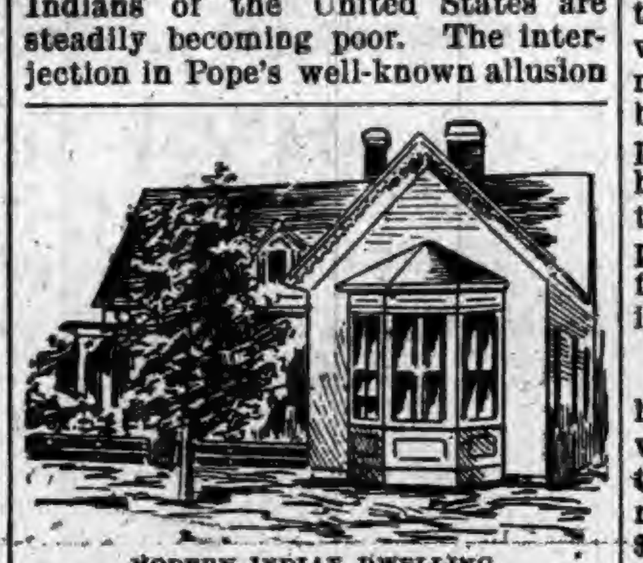
WEALTHY INDIANS.

DON'T COMMISERATE "LO, THE POOR INDIAN."

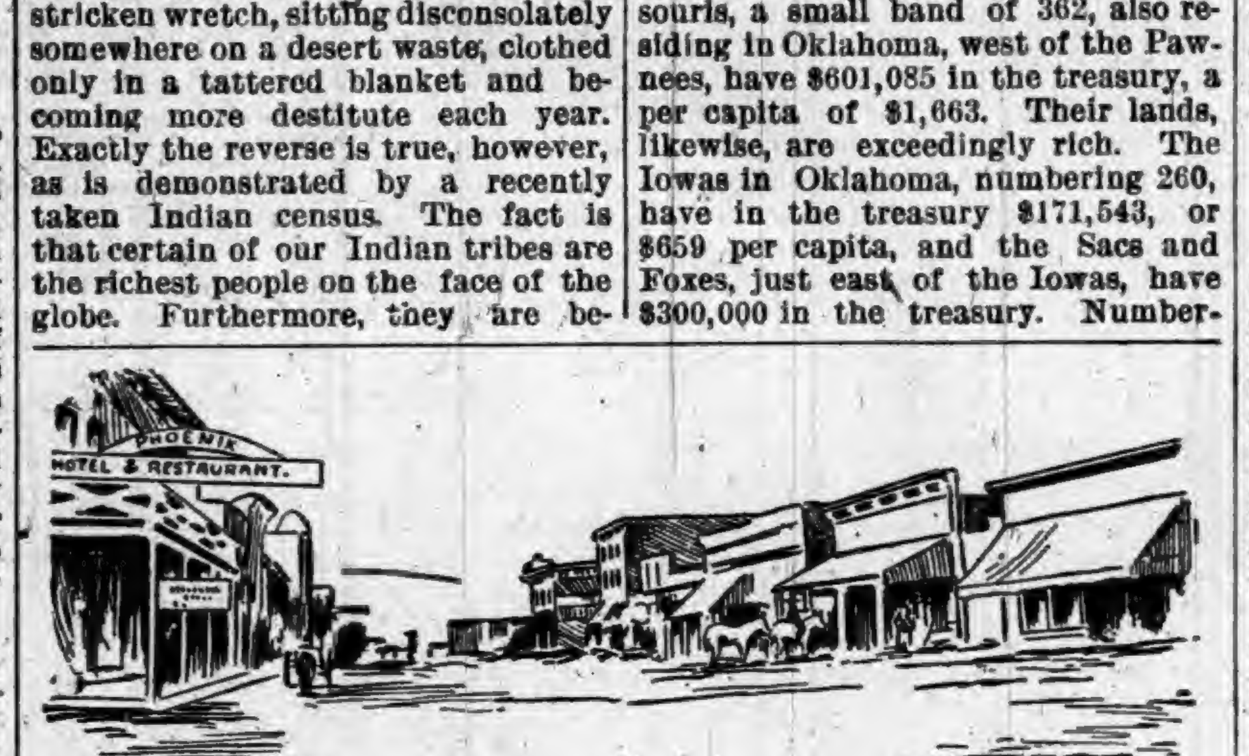
Some Tribes Richer than Any Equal Body—Property in Money, Land, and Stock—Those Who Wear Civilized Attire and Can Read.

Surprising Statistics.

The opening of the Cherokee Strip to settlement and the recent acquisition by the Government of various other Indian reservations have given rise to a popular impression that the Indians of the United States are steadily becoming poor. The interjection in Pope's well-known allusion to the American aborigine, "Lo, the poor Indian," has come to be regarded as a proper name, and the impression prevails that "Lo" is a poverty-stricken wretch, sitting disconsolately somewhere on a desert waste, clothed only in a tattered blanket and becoming more destitute each year. Exactly the reverse is true, however, as is demonstrated by a recently taken Indian census. The fact is that certain of our Indian tribes are the richest people on the face of the globe. Furthermore, they are becoming rapidly still wealthier, for, as their numbers decrease, their wealth per capita undergoes a corresponding increase.



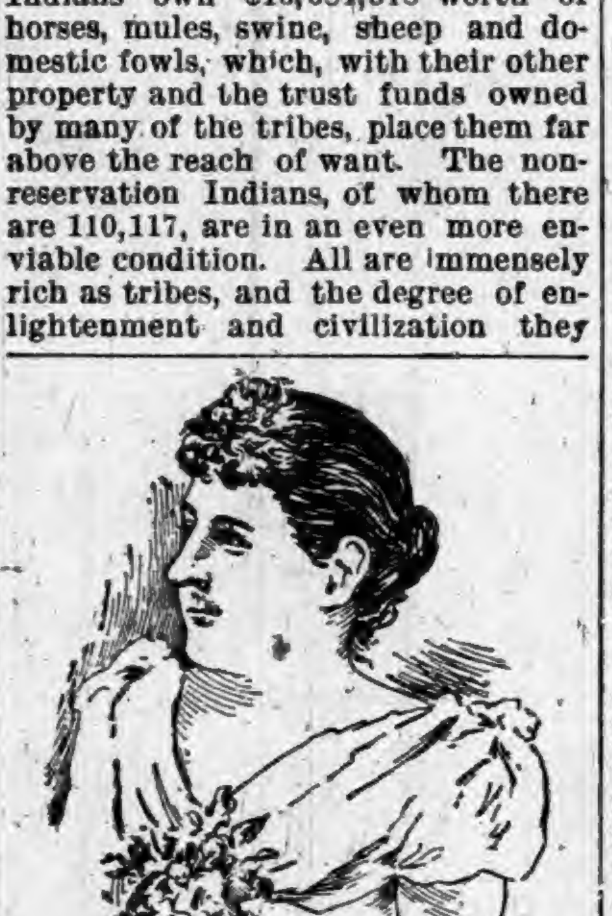
MODERN INDIAN DWELLING.



MAIN STREET, MUSCOGEE, INDIAN TERRITORY.

Our Indian Population.

There are to-day 243,534 Indians—men, women and children—in the United States, and of this number 76 per cent., or 186,574, are self-supporting and receive no subsistence supplies from the Government. Of the total number, 133,417 are known as reservation Indians, residing as wards of the nation on 129 different reservations in twenty States and Territories, the reservations being made either by law, by executive order or by treaty and subject to increase or diminution by the Government at pleasure. These reservation Indians own $13,684,518 worth of horses, mules, swine, sheep and domestic fowls, which, with their other property and the trust funds owned by many of the tribes, place them far above the reach of want. The nonreservation Indians, of whom there are 110,117, are in an even more enviable condition. All are immensely rich as tribes, and the degree of enlightenment and civilization they have attained is a startling revelation to the uninitiated.

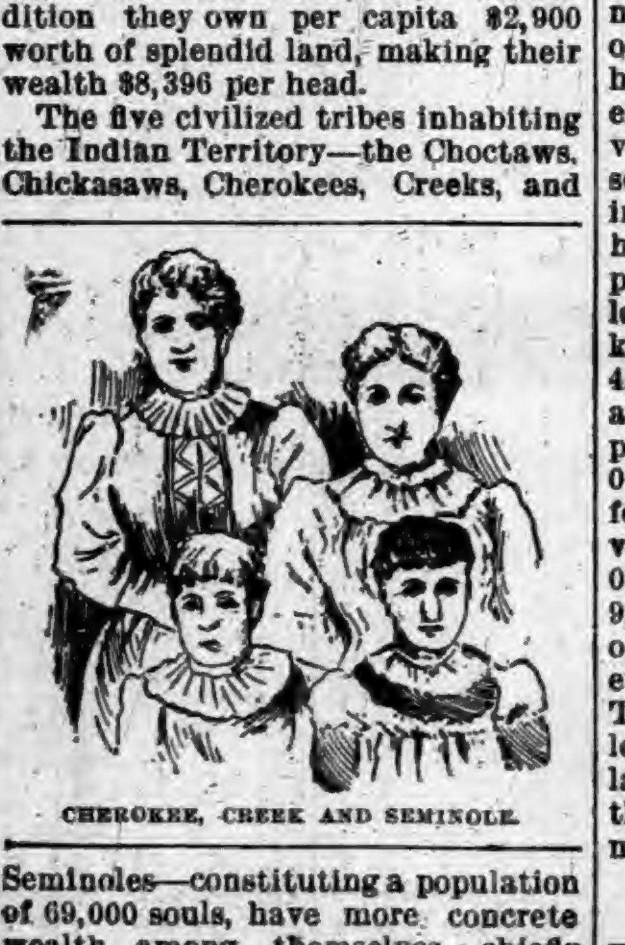


MISS ROSS, A HALF-BLOOD BELLE.

The Richest Tribe.

The richest tribe and, probably, the richest nation in the world is the Delaware. Once this was a powerful tribe in the Middle States, but there are only 95 souls left of it, and they are out in Oklahoma. They have to their credit in the United States treasury $874,168, which is $9,202 in cold cash to every man, woman and papoose, besides their land and stock, which bring their per capita wealth to $11,202. Next to the Delawares are the Osages, numbering 1,509, and living in Oklahoma, with a tribal government of their own. They have the sum of $8,295,079 in the United States Treasury, a per capita fund of $5,496, bearing $255 interest annually. In addition they own per capita $2,900 worth of splendid land, making their wealth $8,396 per head.

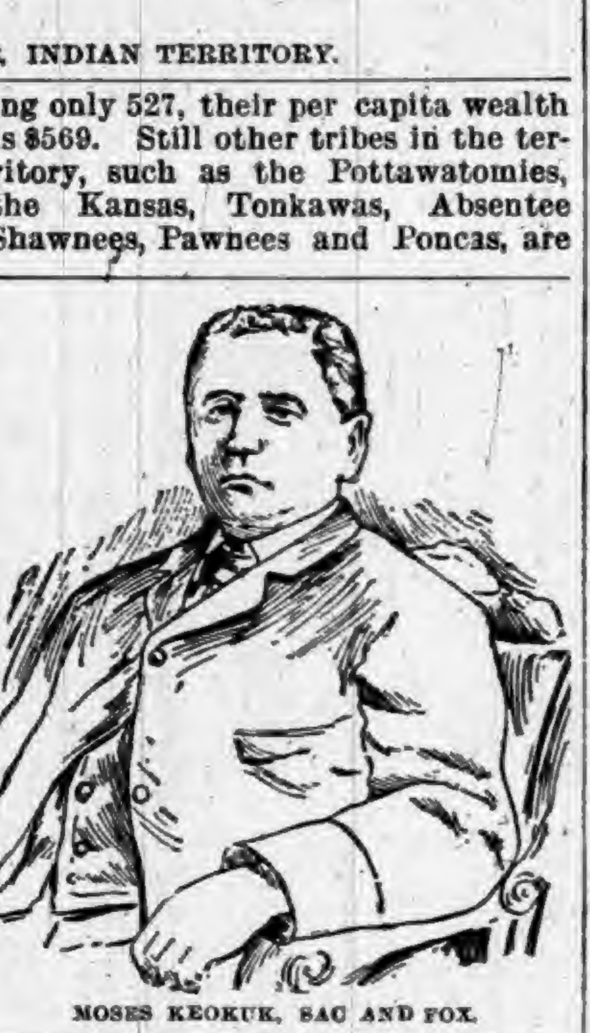
The five civilized tribes inhabiting the Indian Territory—the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminoles—constituting a population of 69,000 souls, have more concrete wealth among themselves, chiefly held in common by each tribe, than any body of people of equal size under the sun. Once absolute savages, infesting the bottoms and wildernesses of Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, they are now creditable and cultivated citizens, of perhaps a little higher order than many of our imported European-Americans, with legislative, executive, and judicial departments, trial by jury and right of appeal to the Supreme Court. The men, as a rule, are handsome, and the women comely, frequently even beautiful. Altogether the five tribes have in bank and in the United States treasury the aggregate sum of $19,000,000; they own 20,000,000 acres of land, some of it literally underlaid with deposits of coal, iron, and other rich mineral resources, the whole valued at $100,000,000 and easily salable at that figure to-day; they produce between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000 worth of farm crops every year, and their live stock is estimated at 756,000 head. Besides all this they have prosperous cities and towns, with schools, newspapers, factories, mills, and workshops in large numbers and $177,066 worth of church property. Not counting their stock, houses, mills or factories, but simply their land, trust funds and farm products, the per capita wealth of the five tribes, men, women and children, is $1,812.



CHEROKEE, CREEK AND SEMINOLE.

The Scattered Tribes.

Near by, in the territory of Oklahoma, are numerous tribes of very wealthy Indians. Among these are the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, who number only 3,210, but have $1,000,000 held in the treasury in trust, and $1,500,000 more as the proceeds from the sale of some land three years ago, making $2,500,000 in all, or $778 per capita. They also own a vast body of land. The Otoes and Missouris, a small band of 362, also residing in Oklahoma, west of the Pawnees, have $601,085 in the treasury, a per capita of $1,663. Their lands, likewise, are exceedingly rich. The Iowas in Oklahoma, numbering 260, have in the treasury $171,543, or $659 per capita, and the Sacs and Foxes, just east of the Iowas, have $300,000 in the treasury. Numbering only 527, their per capita wealth is $569. Still other tribes in the territory, such as the Pottawatomies, the Kansas, Tonkawas, Absentee Shawnees, Pawnees and Poncas, are exceedingly well off. Off in South Dakota is a small band, the Sisseton and Wahpeton, of the Sioux family, numbering 1,522, who have $1,699,800 in the treasury, or $1,116 per capita. Out in Utah is a body of Utes, exclusive of the White River branch, who have $1,750,000 in the treasury, which, divided among 2,243, gives $780 to each.

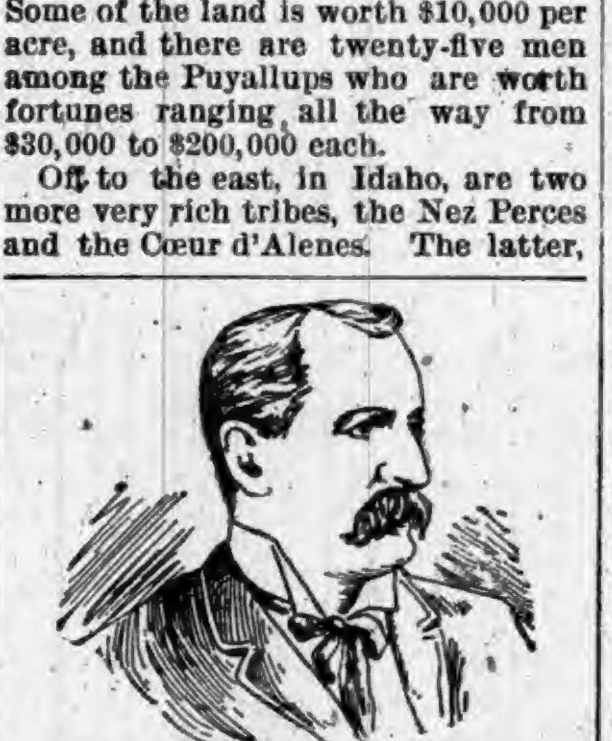


MOSES KEOKUK, SAC AND FOX.

Wealthy Land-owners.

Away up in the State of Washington is a tribe who are the richest in lands of all the aborigines on the continent. They are the Puyallups, numbering 600, the grown males being citizens and voters. Their allotted lands occupy 18,000 acres on the outskirts of the city of Tacoma. Some of the land is worth $10,000 per acre, and there are twenty-five men among the Puyallups who are worth fortunes ranging all the way from $30,000 to $200,000 each.

Off to the east, in Idaho, are two more very rich tribes, the Nez Perces and the Cœur d'Alenes. The latter, numbering but 457, own 598,500 acres of land. Last year they received half a million dollars from the Government for a portion of their reservation. Many of them, besides possessing good farms, well stocked and improved with permanent buildings, have each from $1,000 to $5,000 deposited in the local savings banks or loaned out to merchants over in Spokane, Wash. Last year they had 4,800 acres under prime cultivation and sold $48,000 worth of stock and produce. This season they have 13,000 acres in crop, or nearly 100 acres for every family on the whole reservation. They also have about 192,000 acres under fence. They hold 9,000 head of horses and 1,500 head of cattle. The Nez Perces are a larger tribe, numbering 1,828 persons. They possess 746,651 acres of excellent land, or 406 acres per capita, a large proportion of which is under thorough cultivation and bringing in most remunerative returns.



GEN. PLEASANT PORTER, CREEK.

The Southwestern Indian.

Down in Arizona is a large and wonderfully rich tribe of a pastoral character—the Navajos, numbering 17,204 and owning 8,205,440 acres of land admirably suited to grazing. They pursue stock-raising as a natural avocation and have 1,583,754 head of sheep, 118,798 head of horses and 9,188 head of cattle. They are probably the best armed and equipped Indians on the continent, and are able to put from 6,000 to 7,000 fighting men in the field on the shortest notice. The Moquis, of Arizona, and the Pueblos, of New Mexico, neighbors of the Navajos, are also quite rich and live under an ancient form of government, holding their lands by patents issued by the Spanish Government 400 years ago and since confirmed by the United States Government. The Pueblos alone own 900,000 acres of land, which is worth, exclusive of towns, $3,000,000.

Our Eastern Tribes.

East of the Allegheny mountains, the Eastern Cherokees, forming a body politic incorporated under the laws of North Carolina, are another favored race. There are 2,885 of them and they hold 65,000 acres of land, of which 20,000 acres are arable, 30,000 well suited for grazing and 10,000 covered with valuable timber. The Six Nations of New York, progeny of the original Iroquois made famous by Cooper's novels, are made up of the Onondaga, Oneida, Tonawanda, Allegheny, Cattaraugus, Tuscarora and St Regis tribes and live on reservations of their own, being sovereignties within themselves, governed by a constitution ratified by the Legislature of New York. They are further advanced in civilization than any other reservation Indians. They speak and read English, wear citizens' clothes and own 87,327 acres of land, valued at $1,810,699, and other property valued at $1,284,998. If this wealth were divided among them equally, it would give to each of the 5,203 Indians and adopted persons there, $595.

The Colors of the Earth.

The wonderful difference between the same landscape in winter and in summer is a phenomenon familiar to all dwellers in the temperate zones. The two great elements of change are the presence of snow in winter and of leaves of grass in summer. If we could look at our globe from the moon the variations in its aspect due to seasonal changes would perhaps be even more striking than it appears to those upon its surface.

In fact, we sometimes lose sight of the very important part which vegetation plays in giving color to what might be called the countenance of the planet.

It is not the higher forms of plants that always produce the greatest effect in this way. Some of the most striking scenes upon the earth owe their characteristic features to mosses and lichens. The famous "crimson cliffs" of Greenland, which extend for miles northward from Cape York, derive their splendid color from the growth of red lichen which covers their faces.

The cliffs rise between seventeen hundred and two thousand feet straight from the water's edge, and being composed of gray granite, their aspect would be entirely different from what it is but for the presence of the lichen.

Coming to less magnificent but not less beautiful scenes, the rocky pass called the Golden Gate in the Yellowstone National Park owes its rich color and its name to the yellow lichen covering its lofty walls; and the indescribable hues of the great hot-spring terraces arise mainly from the presence of minute plants flourishing in the water that overflows them.

Considered as a whole, the vegetation of a planet may give it a characteristic aspect as viewed from space. Many have thought that the red color of Mars may be due to the existence of red instead of green vegetation there.

That its broad expanses of forest and prairie land cause the earth to reflect a considerable quantity of green light to its neighbors is indicated by the fact that at the time of the new moon a greenish tint has been detected overspreading that part of the lunar surface which is then illuminated only by light from the earth.—Youth's Companion.

Printer Lynch.

The printers' stories that were told last week brought out a new one about a man named Lynch, which illustrates the crankiness of the printer's nature. He had cases on the Tribune, but he objected to working Saturday night. Saturday night is the heavy night on all morning newspapers, and Mr. Lynch might as well have asked for marmalade with which to paste his "string" as ask to get off that night. But he was a determined man, and he had been a printer long enough to be mean, and there is nothing more ornery than a mean printer, except a mean proofreader, who does not belong to any supernatural comparisons. So when Mr. Lynch had asked to be relieved of Saturday night duty and had been refused he just lay down and refused to set more than 3,000 ems for any man.

The foreman did not want to cut the elevator rope on Mr. Lynch, so he told him he need not work on Saturday night at all, and Mr. Lynch was glad. He went down to John Jacky O'Brien's tunnel and over a large glass of pilsener confided to a number of gentlemen who had arisen from sleep as if awakened by an alarm clock upon his entrance that the man who would toil Saturday night was little less than a serf. Thereafter Saturday night idleness began to irk Mr. Lynch, and in less than a month he came down one Saturday afternoon, took a chew of tobacco and started for his case.

"Hold on there, Lynch! Where are you going?" demanded the foreman.

"Going to work," said Mr. Lynch.

"Oh, no; this is Saturday night."

"Mean to say I can't go to work?"

"Certainly."

"Going to make me stand a bobtail week?"

"Of course."

"Then as a member of Chicago Typographical Union 16, with my dues paid up and a working card in my pocket, I want to say that before I'll let any slave driver of a foreman prevent me from working seven days a week I'll resign."

And so he did, and went to work in the office of the Plumber's Gazette, where the type was as big as doughnuts and the proofreader marked commas in the middle of words.—Chicago Post.

ONE day's fast means three bad days for bread.

A Gum-Chewing Fish.

It is not always safe to judge by appearances, for often, as the poet Longfellow says, "Things are not what they seem." Some years ago the writer of this article was fishing from a boat in Mississippi Sound opposite Biloxi, when growing tired of a piece of gum which she had been trying in vain to learn to like, she dropped it into the water. What was her astonishment when within the next half-hour she caught a fish with this identical piece of gum in its mouth. This is a fish story, but it is absolutely true, and not so very remarkable either, when one remembers that there were a half-dozen lines hanging from the boat at the time, each holding a tempting bait, so that the fish who had snapped up the gum would be apt to linger near the luring snares and be eventually caught.—Harper's Young People.

Novel Fire Protection.

One of the cheapest, simplest and most efficient devices for the protection of shingle roofs from fire is being introduced in some cities. It consists of nothing more than a water pipe running along the ridge board of the roof and connected with the water service of the building. The roof pipe is perforated at short intervals so that at a moment's notice the roof can be flooded and rendered impervious to sparks and blazing fragments blown from the burning buildings in the neighborhood. The device is at once so simple and effective that one wonders why its introduction was not coeval with that of water mains and hydrants.—Boston Real Estate Record.

Severe Laws in a Small Republic.

It is said that San Marino, the diminutive Italian Republic, and the oldest government of its kind in existence, has the most severe criminal laws of any civilized country known. Thieves have the right hand chopped off, and murderers are hurled over a precipice into the deep gorge of Feri. As a result of this severity, no murder was chronicled for a long time, until some years ago, when a woman was convicted of having wantonly killed her young daughter. Notwithstanding her prayers for mercy, the sentence of the law was strictly adhered to.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Dean Swift's Unpronounceable Name.

A writer in Notes and Queries, referring to the origin of "houyhuhnm," says that this curious jumble of letters was devised by Swift to represent the whinnying of a horse. It is a dissyllable. I have heard it variously pronounced by educated persons. The prevailing pronunciations may be phonetically rendered as follows: "Hoo-himz," "hoo-inmz," "whin-imz," and "hoo-inimz." The initial aspirate is always sounded. Pope uses it as a dissyllable:

Nay, would kind Jove my organs so dispose
To hymn harmonious Houyhnhums through the nose.

A Lamp Cane.

A German inventor has produced an electric cane lamp. The handle of the cane contains an incandescent lamp, the two poles of which are connected with the plates of a battery. Below this is a small chamber to carry the battery fluid. When it is desired to use the lamp the cap is taken off and the cane inclined so that the liquid it contains comes in contact with the electrodes. A current is thus produced that will, it is asserted, keep the light going for an hour.

A Reader's Reflection.

"I wish I was a heroine—in a story. It must be delightful to have a clever author to do all your talking for you, make up your mind for you, supply you with plenty of excitement, and make a noble creature out of you without your oing anything whatsoever."—Harper's Bazar.

Erysipelas in My Face and head had long troubled me. I became nearly blind and my hair all came out. I doctored without relief. Finally Hood's Sarsaparilla was highly recommended, and after taking three bottles I was free from my trouble and long sufferings. Last winter after an attack of the grip I became easily tired and had no appetite. I resorted to Hood's. The tired feeling is gone and I have a good appetite. Unique Decorations of Nilsson's Home.

The great cantatrice, Mme. Christine Nilsson, who is known in Spanish society as the Countess of Miranda—a title acquired five years ago by her marriage with a nobleman of the peninsula—lives for the greater part of the year in a fine house—almost, indeed, a palace at Madrid. In its internal decoration she has displayed a certain amount of eccentricity, for the bedroom is papered with sheets of music from the scores of the various operas that she has interpreted, while the walls of the dining-room are covered with a collection of hotel bills, the result of the day's many professional travels in both hemispheres.—Philapelphia Bulletin.

Curiosities Among Bees.

The "tazma" of Ethiopia deposits stores of honey without wax. It looks like a giant mosquito, and its product, which it hides away underground, is eagerly sought after by the natives as a remedy for diseases of the throat. In some parts of India there are giant bees which suspend combs as big as house doors in the branches of the trees. The Guadaloupe bees lay their honey in bladders of wax about the size of a pigeon's egg and not in combs. The bees, which are abnormally small, have no stings, and are of a black color, and the honey which they produce is of an oily consistency, never hardening.—Boston Globe.

"German Syrup"

Two bottles of German Syrup cured me of Hemorrhage of the Lungs when other remedies failed. I am a married man and, thirty-six years of age, and live with my wife and two little girls at Durham, Mo. I have stated this brief and plain so that all may understand. My case was a bad one, and I shall be glad to tell anyone about it who will write me. PHILIP L. SCHENCK, P. O. Box 45, April 25, 1890. No man could ask a more honorable, business-like statement.

CORRESPONDENCE

WATERLOO.

Mrs. Frank Long, from California, is here for an extended visit with her relatives and friends.

Mrs. Nichols, who has been ill all summer, is now very sick. Her mother and sister from Michigan are here to care for her.

John Fisher and wife, of Ft Wayne, spent fair week in Waterloo visiting relatives and attending the fair. Mrs Fisher has quite recently returned from California where she went to spend some time with her parents and her sister, Mrs. Frank Long, who resides in the golden state.

Miss Allie Phillips has returned from her second visit to the world's fair. Her ticket did not expire until Oct. 17, but having taken a bad cold from which she was suffering severely, she came three days earlier. She has been quite sick since, having had regular croup, and later, scarlet rash.

The little house on wheels in which the wooly headed girl was exhibited, was established on Wayne street until after the reunion occurred. From the number of people seen to enter their receipts must have amounted to quite a sum. There were other strangers here also during Wednesday, with different ways to draw a crowd with the one object to make as much money out of said crowd as possible.

Monday afternoon of this week Ora Bohler's team ran away. It was hitched near the station, but the cars or something else startled the horses and they broke away and ran down street, turning into Wayne street as a train was passing. Before they reached the track some brave man ran and springing on the dray, caught the lines and by main strength turned them and finally stopped them. Mr. Bohler is in Chicago himself.

The reunion of the 88th regiment took place in Waterloo, Wednesday, Oct. 18, 1893. It was well attended by the soldiers and their wives. The day was fine, neither too warm nor too cold. It was pleasant to see the meeting and hearty grasp of the hand of those who had been in battle together, who had shared alike when rations were full, and when short, leaving each man to his own devices to satisfy his hunger or obtain more variety. Those who had the privilege of attending the afternoon exercises and campfire in the evening thoroughly enjoyed it throughout.

The L. M. C. held the first meeting of their new year at the home of Mrs. Mary Morell, Tuesday evening, Oct. 24. Having completed the four years Chautauqua course as prescribed, the committee appointed for that duty have prepared a new and varied program for the coming year, and the entire class seem ready to enter upon their work with new zeal, believing it will not only be full of interest, but time profitably spent; not so much deep study as with other duties well performed will make the study a burden, or yet the students dull like the proverbial "Jack," neither will the lighter part of the program be "all play." Accordingly then the members of the L. M. C. are in no danger of becoming "mere toys."

THE GREAT WORLD'S FAIR.

We Shall Never see Its Like Again. It Ends Oct. 30.

As the fair draws to a close it might not be amiss to call attention more fully to the displays made by foreign and distant nations, for these we may never see again. If one has time and money he may see a great deal of these people themselves and their habits and customs in the Midway Plaisance. There one finds real villages, real castles, real theaters and other entertainments the models of which do justice in every way to the originals across the sea. And the most realistic thing in all, is the sight of the real people now staying for a limited time, the first time in their lives, in this country. But to see the higher civilization of the old world and its valuable productions, the things on which their prosperity and standing among the nations of the earth depend, we should go to the various foreign buildings that have been erected and furnished in the grounds. Among the most elaborate and beautiful of these is the

GERMAN BUILDING.

This is at the north end and near the lake and is a fine substantial structure, painted outside so as to show decorations in colors, giving it a very artistic appearance. Within is a wilderness of fine work of all sorts, in iron, wood, cloths, pictures, wax figures and the like, as well as very elaborate educational or school work. It is a study of many hours. Near by is

THE SPANISH BUILDING.

It is filled with many fine and costly works of art, including some very valuable old pictures—quite large, some of them, and generally belonging to the age of Spain that was much more brilliant than its present—when the discoveries of Columbus and other explorers had made Spain one of the foremost nations of the earth. There were many photos of views in Spanish cities and country scenes, as well as photos of eminent persons. It looked, though, as if Spain had revived for a brief time long enough to call our attention to her departed glories.

THE BRAZIL BUILDING.

Our new South American sister republic makes a grand showing with a large, lovely building whose interior decoration is as beautiful as its exterior is imposing. Naturally enough the interior is filled all over with her leading products, coffee and cacao beans. The coffee is everywhere and in every shape and condition. It is too common to need description. The grand rooms of this building show partly the design of the palace of their emperors, or as now, the parliament house of the republic. There are fine, large oil paintings of scenes in the early and in the later history of their country. Among them is "The First Mass," the first one celebrated in Brazil. The priests have erected a rough cross in the woods and all around them are gathered the wondering natives. It is a grand picture. Another large one shows the court of Dom Pedro, with himself and empress seated on thrones, while the impressive ceremony of "Kissing of the Gold Book" is taking place, a sort of swearing allegiance.

THE SWEDISH BUILDING.

This is one of the most important on the grounds. The display of articles made of iron, is of course, the leading one. It is the most varied and wonderful on the grounds. They have carried this work to an extent few had supposed, equalling in many lines the work of Germany, England or the United States. There were sewing machines, rifles, bicycles, clock frames, fine axes, tools of all sorts and vast numbers of all sorts of saws, including band saws—one of the last named being 650 feet long, made from one piece of steel. There was fine crockery, books, wood carving and wax figures, in which all these north European nations seem to excel. There were displays of furs and of Portland cement. The most interesting of the new things shown was the display of "snow runners" for coasting over ice and crusted snow. These are about ten feet long, light, smooth and strong. They are slightly arched in the middle, thus giving some spring to the steps, but are curved up at each end a few inches like runners of a low sled. They are flat, about two to four inches wide, with a thick raised part on which the feet rest and where the straps are fastened. A wax figure of a hunter on one of these sets of runners with an iron pointed staff in his hand and a gun over his back gives an idea of how they are used. A man can "fly" going down hill. Then there are pictures, fine silver work and many other things.

THE INDIA BUILDING.

This great dependency of Great Britian makes a better display than does the mother country and we may say the same of New South Wales and Canada. India shows her leading wares which are many and very fine. Tea now leads as a commercial product and this grand display is mostly at the expense of a great tea company of that country, consisting mainly of English merchants. The building is of the style and finish of the best in India, and in the interior they serve tea in all their best styles and without price, the waiters being native East Indians in native dress. They are fine looking men of the same type as Europeans, only they are as dark as our American Indians. They speak English very well for their country has been full of the English for a hundred years or so. They have the rooms full to overflowing of their work in lacquered porcelain, fine cloths, fine swords and guns ancient and modern, many gods, fine marble work, carpets and other fine cloths and laces, work in ivory, and some native drawings and pictures. India claims to be ahead of China now in tea production.

VENEZUELA BUILDING.

As in case of Brazil, this South American state almost surprises us. Its building is large and expensive. The first thing one sees on entering is an immense painting of a bull fight. It is by a master hand and shows this cruel sport and its excited audience in a manner almost life-like. It is too real for Americans to look at with much pleasure. They show fine grades of coffee, work in and specimens of marble, of gold and silver, wines, cotton and cacao beans. The last named article is that from which chocolate is made. The beans resemble the kernels of almonds, though the points are not as sharp and they have a more "fuzzy" look. They fill one department and are kept in jars. Then there are displays of tobacco, of the phospate earths and rocks found there, making a creditable display. The varied products shown by these distant countries shows or should show our statesmen how valuable would be more friendly trade relations with those countries, so we could get their productions cheaper and sell them vast amounts of our farm products and all sorts of manufactured articles

(To be continued next week.)

A STRANGE CASE.

How an Enemy was Foiled.

The following graphic statement will be read with intense interest: "I cannot describe the numb, creepy sensation that existed in my arms, hands and legs. I had to rub and beat those parts until they were sore, to overcome in a measure the dead feeling that had taken possession of them. In addition, I had a strange weakness in my back and around my waist, together with an indescribable 'gone' feeling in my stomach. Physicians said it was creeping paralysis, from which, according to their universal conclusion, there is no relief. Once it fastens upon a person, they say, it continues its insidious progress until it reaches a vital point and the sufferer dies. Such was my prospect. I had been doctoring a year and a half steadily, but with no particular benefit, when I saw an advertisement of Dr Miles' Restorative Nervine, procured a bottle and began using it. Marvelous as it may seem, but a few days had passed before every bit of that creepy feeling had left me, and there has not been even the slightest indication of its return. I now feel as well as I ever did, and have gained ten pounds in weight, though I had run down from 170 to 137. Four others have used Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine on my recomendation, and it has been as satisfactory in their cases as in mine."—James Kane, La Rue, O.

Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine is sold by all druggists on a positive guarantee, or sent direct by the Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind., on receipt of price, $1 per bottle, six bottles for $5, express prepaid. It is free from opiates or dangerous drugs.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

1873—Concluded.

In the matter of banking, as in the provision of fire apparatus, the town of Waterloo became the pioneer in DeKalb county, to be outdone in time by Auburn as it increased in wealth and business.

In May, 1873, W. C. Langan, of Lima, O., became formally associated with O. T. Clark, J. I. Best and C. A. O. McClellan, of Waterloo, for the purpose of doing a general banking business in that place, under the name of DeKalb County Bank. On July 24, their safe, weighing 14,000 pounds, arrived from the manufactory of Diebold, Kienzle & Co., of Canton, O., and was placed in the office located in the south side of what was known as the Clark building, north of the Lake Shore railroad crossing.

The capital of this early bank was placed at $50,000. Mr. Langan became the cashier and business manager of the bank and the enterprise gave much satisfaction to the public.

For a brief period, beginning early in the year, Auburn presented the anomaly of having only one saloon. Probably not another countyseat in the state could have made so good a showing; but as the season wore on, this gratifying prospect faded away so that in the following fall, intoxication had become more prevalent than ever before and many drunken men lay around the streets in a helpless condition.

The transient population engaged in building the railroads were charged with this offense that made children fearful, the streets unsafe and militated against the good name of the town, but it was also attributable to the pendulum swing to an opposite extreme from local prohibition and emphasized the truism that all moral growth must be natural and must follow, not precede, the potent influence of public opinion.

While deteriorating forces were active and largely unchecked, the remedial powers of education and religion were becoming stronger and becoming systematized. At a meeting of the County Board of Education held at Waterloo on Sept. 1, under the conduct of Supt. Barns, a progressive step was embodied in the resolution that, "No teacher be allowed to introduce any new text book into any school in DeKalb county except such as have been adopted by proper action of the County Board."

On motion of Mr. Griswold, of Auburn, McGuffey's new readers were adopted by a vote of 17 to 2. Cornell's and the Eclectic Geographies were rejected and McNally's series were substituted. Harvey's Grammar was selected and Wright's Orthography was adopted unanimously. By this official course, the trustees protected the schools from the exercise of unwarranted and pernicious powers and, reducing the number, increased the size of classes, greatly to the advantage of teacher and pupils.

The spring term of the Auburn schools closed satisfactorily and the prospects for the fall were unusually promising when a new school board was chosen, consisting of the veteran Wyllys Griswold, Albert Totten and J. J. Wood, the last two fresh arrivals. Mr. Wood had hoped to secure the services of Prof. H. S. Lehr, of a normal school located at Ada, Ohio, for the conduct of the fall term of the Auburn Academy, but being disappointed in this, the board promoted his intended assistant, A. R. Hoffman, to the position of Principal at the then high salary of $5 a day for a term of twelve weeks.

The board of trustees thoroughly repaired and refitted the school house for the comfort and convenience of pupils and engaged as assistant teachers, Mollie Schoonover, Hattie L. Griswold and Mattie Miller, for the grammar, intermediate and primary departments.

The new corps of teachers began work September 1, under a lengthy code of rules that, despite friction consequent to tardiness, resulted well. There existed a great disparity of enrollment in the different rooms disproportionate to the remuneration of the teachers. In the High School were 44; Grammar, 89; Intermediate, 81 and Primary, 108.

A new school law provided that when a petition had been signed by twenty-five or more persons who desired German taught in a common school, the trustees should hire a teacher. Such a petition was presented to the Auburn school board, who thereupon agreed with one A. B. Cluckner, whose further duties were defined as those of a janitor. There were but five pupils who studied German and it appears that a sense of inconsistency in hiring a teacher of a foreign language for these few in an American public school found expression in the resolution that, "Whereas, an English education is of paramount importance, no study other than English will be permitted in other than the higher grades."

Prof. Hoffman and his lady assistants proved excellent teachers and all were retained for the regular terms, during which they so devoted themselves to their high calling that progress was made certain and their protracted and harmonious conduct of respective parts of school work left nothing to be desired but ampler accommodations for the increasing numbers consequent upon town growth.

In the various churches, temporal activity indicated spiritual interest. Under the lead of Rev. Cone, the Methodists held a successful protracted meeting, and during April, the Rev. T. E. Fisher, a man pleasing and interesting in manner and matter of speech, attracted large congregations to the Presbyterian church and this brought about his retention as its minister.

Another church reinforced in numbers by the increasing population of Auburn now came prominently into notice. The society of German Methodists had an unorganized existence in the town from a comparatively early date. Ministers of this denomination held services at private houses on such occasions as brought them to this neighborhood, but paucity of numbers precluded attempt at forming a society. Probably Rev. John Schneider was the pioneer preacher in this locality.

On Nov. 1, 1858, Rev. F. Ruff organized what is known as the Kendallville circuit of which Auburn was, and still is, an appointment, although preaching was at first at a point north of the town. This minister, who is recognized as the founder of the Auburn society, served for two years acceptably. The original membership consisted of George and Catharine Eckhart, Herman and Eva Frœlich, Elizabeth Pullman, John and Caroline Raesch, John and Frederika Steffin, F. Raut, Sr., Charles Raut, Jr., Maria and Charlotte Raut.

The first officers chosen were George Frœlich, Exhorter and George Eckhart, Steward. No trustees to mark official existence were elected until about twelve years later.

The immediate successors of Rev. Ruff were A. Gerlach 1860-'62, J. C. Weidman 1862-'64, G. Schwinn 1863-'67, C. A. Miltzer 1867-'69, Henry Krill 1869-'71, and A. Meyer 1871-'74.

From 1871, there were generally assistant preachers sent on the Kendallville circuit, who mostly lived at Auburn. Joseph Kern was the first of these. He was followed by G. Weiler, of Ft. Wayne, succeeded by J. Lamprecht, who remained two years and co-operated with Rev. Meyer to establish the church upon a strong and enduring basis. These ministers conducted a protracted meeting in 1872, which brought about a revival and ten conversions. The Sunday school was organized this year and continued till 1880, when it was closed for a number of years.

Encouraged by increasing numbers and mindful of the advantages derived from a place of worship, the society, in 1874, considered the question of a church lot and building. To secure the former, a committee of three persons was appointed on May 25th. The committee, consisting of Frederick Raut, Charles Raut and John Raesch, chose Lot 4, O. P., upon which the church and parsonage now stand.

Five members had meanwhile been elected by the quarterly conference at Kendallville as trustees of Emanuel M. E. church, viz; F. Raut, C. Raut, J. Raesch, H. Wartensleben and John B. Lobmiller. These parties, Aug. 24, bought of Andrew Mager, of Noble county, the lot selected, paying for the same $250, and promptly took measures for the erection thereon of a frame meeting house.

Work began and was carried forward to completion when the church was dedicated by Rev. Roberts, of Ft. Wayne. A report was made that the cost of the building was $2,740. There had been collected, $1,780. There remained $862 of subscription, leaving a deficit of $200, which was provided by the Church Extension Society of the Central German Conference.

The building was later supplied with a fine bell, and in 1892 a neat parsonage was built at a cost of $1,400.

Successive ministers with date of service have been as follows; John Bodmer, 1874-6; William Mueller, 1876-9; H. Buddenbaur, 1879-81; A. Gerlich, returned, 1881-2; J. C. Gommel, 1882-5; J. H. Schimmelpfinig, 1885-6; John Haas, 1886-91, H. Rogatsky, 1891, incumbent.

The assistant and resident ministers for the same time have been as follows: C. Treuschel, William Conzelmann, W. Hamp, G. Moehring, C. Henke, S. P. Spechman, A. C. Baur, D. Dobbick, W. Rogetzby and C. B. Koch in charge.

The church experienced a revival in 1879, during the pastorate of Revs. Mueller and Conzelmann, resulting in fifteen conversions, but in general a few were brought in every year who filled the places of those who died or moved away.

The Sunday school was reorganized in 1890 by Rev. Dobbick and continues to be an aid to the church. The present superintendent is Henry Schamberg. The number of scholars is twenty and of teachers and officers eight. The church has thirty members, besides several on probation. Although the congregation is small, they are doing a good work for the Lord; their field of labor among the German citizens of Auburn is extensive and their prospects of success are promising.

MRS. EGBERT B. MOTT.

Died at her home north of Auburn, on Wednesday morning Oct 4, 1893, Mary Winterbotham Mott, aged 87 years and 8 months, having been born in Lancashire, England, Feb. 4, 1806.

She came to America with her parents in 1811 and during her girlhood lived in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, and was married in Abingdon, Luzerne county Pa., Dec. 30, 1830, to Egbert Bensen Mott, a native of Datchess county, New York.

In 1836, Mr. Mott removed with his wife and two sons to Knox county, Ohio, where the younger shortly after died.

In 1843, on the 16th day of Oct. Mr. Mott with his wife and four children, three sons and a daughter, arrived in Auburn, a very different Auburn then, from the Auburn of to-day, Mr. Mott was the first lawyer to settle here; henceforth this was their home. Here they brought up their children to manhood and womanhood. Here they lived out their earthly lives. Here they together mourned their brave young son Sheridan who, wounded Sept. 20, 1863 at Chickamauga, died in hospital May 15, 1864.

Sixteen months later, Judge Mott died, but his virtues are still remembered. A man of wide reading, remarkable memory, and cool and impartial judgment, he was also that rarer thing, a christian gentleman, in word and deed, who set before his fellows the example of a pure and blameless life. They, who knew him best in the intimacy of friendship, and in his home, valued most highly the steadfastness of purpose and conviction which could not be moved. Such a character does not come by any accident of birth or chance. It is built up by continual well-doing.

In the household of which Judge Mott was the head, the business of each day was begun by the reading of God's word, and prayer for His blessing.

It was, perhaps, not to be wondered at, however deplored, that his widow, having lost the arm on which she had leaned so long, and the faithful heart which had never disappointed her, should with increasing age and weakness, seclude herself more and more from the outer world to find among the books which she so dearly loved, her chief companionship. Those who visited her, found her little changed in her mental attitude toward men and things. She was still bright, witty, interested in affairs of state, and her love for her native country burning with as pure a flame as ever, her love for her children and friends fond as ever.

Mrs. Mott was a member of the P. E. church and died in its communion, trusting in the atoning blood of Christ. She left a sister and two brothers, all younger than herself. Her brother, Ex-senator J. H. Winterbotham, of Michigan City, Indiana, was connected to Mrs. Mott by a double tie, her youngest son, John G. Mott, having married his cousin, Mr. Winterbotham's second daughter.

Mrs. Mott's oldest son Egbert B. Mott, Jr., of Sacramento, Cal., died there April 4, 1882. Her only daughter, Mrs. Hodge, widow of Chester P. Hodge and John G. Mott, of Michigan City, Ind., survive their mother.

Her last months were full of suffering, but after a long life, which had seen much joy and many sorrows, our Father took her tired spirit to Himself.

Farmers, Plant Plums.

C. P. Houser is delivering fruit trees now. We feel particularly interested in the growing of plums, which have proved such a success for the past year or two. Mr. Houser sold all his crop this year at $4 a bushel and could have sold any amount. He had two young trees that had been planted but two years and were five years only from the graft, that each bore a half bushel. He has a lot of plum trees for sale, grafted on plum stocks, which are always much better than those grafted on peach stocks, as some are. They do better, are hardier and bear better. His experience, and that of many others, is that plums are the easiest to raise and the most sure and most profitable of any fruit. They are saved by merely spraying the trees two or three times. Everyone who has the ground should raise plums.

CIRCLING THE GLOBE.

CONCISE HISTORY OF SEVEN DAYS' DOINGS.

The Murderer of the Wratten Family Makes Another Confession—Fatal Collision at Norfolk, Va.—No Screen Law Goes in Indiana.

THE WRATTEN FAMILY.

Murder Stone Makes Another Confession.

Washington (Ind.) special: It now appears that Stone, who was brought from Jeffersonville the other night to appear before the grand jury, stated that Charles S. McCafferty, whose wife is the heir to the Wratten estate, and Robert Swanegan are among his accomplices in the murder of the Wrattens. C. McCafferty was a son-in-law of old Mrs. Wratten and has been suspected sometime, but as there was no evidence against him he was never arrested. Swanegan lives on the adjoining farm to the Wrattens and formerly kept the City Hotel. Nothing is known against him. This makes eight men Stone, in three different confessions, accused of complicity in this murder. When Stone left in charge of Sheriff Leming to be returned to Jeffersonville, people here had just learned of his presence and about the time the train pulled out crowds could be seen coming from all directions. Stone seemed anxious that the train should start and it was with a sigh of relief that the outskirts of the city were reached. He did not want to be brought here, as he very much feared the peoole's vengeance.

The Screen Law Void.

Indianapolis special: The city authorities of Greencastle passed a saloon-screen ordinance a year ago and endeavored to enforce it. The law required that saloons should be operated without blinds to the windows or obstructions that would prevent the police from seeing the patrons at the bar. James E. Champer was fined by the Mayor on the charge of violating the ordinance. He appealed and the case was carried through the Putnam Circuit Court, where the decision was in favor of the city, sustaining the ordinance.

The Supreme Court has reversed the decision. The opinion was by Judge McCabe. The Judge holds that where municipal corporations pass ordinances, the laws must be reasonable. The use of blinds, shutters, colored glass, and screens in business houses and dwellings is one of the conveniences of civilized life. The Judge hold that they are almost as necessary as the houses themselves. These are permitted in other business houses. Judge McCabe holds that a saloon is a legitimate business, and that it is not necessary to violate the law to make it profitable. The ordinance is declared void. The decision affects several towns of the State.

Combining Into Clubs.

The condition of affairs in Sicily is getting dangerous, owing to the action of the people in combining into clubs called fisci, the object of which is to compel the lessening of taxation and payment of better wages. The Government has sent an official to study the situation, and, if he thinks it necessary, to dissolve the clubs. It is feared that the result of the combinations will be an outbreak against the bourgeois and the officials.

Serious Collision.

A serious railroad collision occurred on the Lamberts Point branch of the Norfolk and Western Railroad in Norfolk, Va., resulting in the death of two men and the dangerous injury of five others. The cause of the accident was a misplaced switch, which allowed a coal train to run into 140 loaded coal cars standing on a side track. Two minutes later a local train ran into the wreck, completely demolishing both engines.

Threw Himself Before a Nickel Plate Train.

A special from Vermillion, Ohio, says: Edgar H. Palmer, a leading lawyer at one time Prosecuting Attorney of Loraine County, committed suicide by throwing himself in front of a Nickel Plate train. Financial reverses had unhinged his reason. Palmer was 53 years of age and married.

Mr. Shanklin Will Not Have It.

The Hon. J. G. Shanklin is reported by his friends at Washington as putting a stop to the movement to make him a Mississippi River Commissioner by informing them that he would not accept if appointed.

Eaten Alive by Wolves.

Tacoma (Wash.) special: Private advices received here state that twenty men were eaten alive by wolves at Shensi, October 14 and 15. Wild animals overrun that district.

The New Chaplain.

The Democrats in caucus have selected as successor to the late Rev. Samuel W. Haddaway, House Chaplain, Rev. Edward B. Bagley, pastor of the Christian Church.

Says He Was Crazy.

Washington (Ind.) special: To a gentleman of unquestioned veracity, who has just returned from Jeffersonville, and who has known the murderer Stone all his life, Stone said he was crazy when he made his first statement before the grand jury implicating the men Keys, Clark, Yarber, Cosby, Williams, and White, and had been crazy ever since the murder. Stone said he was so wrought up over his hellish crime that when he made his first confession he was seized with a desire to implicate anyone who came in his mind. He stated that he had been crazy all along until the other day, and told the whole truth in his last confession, which is generally accepted by the people of this community.

WENT UP IN SMOKE.

A Million Dollar Blaze at Pittsburgh.

Pittsburgh special: Shortly after 1 o'clock Saturday afternoon the entire fire department of the city was summoned to Eleventh and Pike streets. By the time the first engines on the scene were in service flames were bursting from almost every window and door of the immense building owned and occupied by the Chautauqua Lake Ice Company and the Pittsburgh Storage Company. The building occupied a space of 300 by 100 feet, was of brick and stone, seven stories, or eighty feet in height.

Edward Spies, an employe, discovered the fire and gave the alarm. He was working on the fourth floor. Almost instantly he was enveloped in the flames, and although he attempted to fight the fire, he was driven back to a window fifty feet from the ground, through which he made his escape. He crept out upon the narrow sill, and, dropping down, hung by his hands until rescued by the laddermen of truck A. His hands, arms, and face were literally roasted. It was scarcely five minutes after the discovery of the fire until the great structure was ablaze on every floor. A soaking rainfall aided greatly in preventing the spread of the fire, which at several times threatened destruction to the many valuable properties in the vicinity. At 2 o'clock the occupants of surrounding buildings were notified to move out. Between Mulberry Alley and Pennsylvania Avenue on the southeast side of the burning building were a cheap class of tenements, crowded to suffocation with Polish Jews and slaves who were thrown into a panic. Fifteen minutes later the side of the building fell with a crash, burying a large row of the tenements just vacated. Flames burst from the buried dwellings adding danger to surrounding property. At 2:30 o'clock the four upper stories of the Thirteenth street wall fell outward, burying the street to a depth of ten feet and crushing the house of John Glenn, on the opposite side of the street. On the ground floor of the warehouse were five loaded cars. Just before the crash they were drawn, all burning, to a place of safety. Of all the hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of property stored in the building, these five car loads were all that were saved. The large warehouses of the Haveler Storage company, on the opposite side of Pike street, caught fire several times, but were not seriously damaged. The rear of a number of Pennsylvania avenue buildings were also severely scorched. The most serious damage here was to Hiber's drug store, which with contents was almost destroyed. A number of narrow escapes were made by employes in the storage building.

CRANKS AT LARGE.

Supt. Fred. I. Mathias Shot Down at New York.

New York special: An excited workman rushed from the new building of the Postal Telegraph Company, at Broadway and Murray streets, and called out that a murderous crank was at large on the ground floor of the building, who had already shot the clerk of the works and threatened murder by the wholesale. Several police officers immediately rushed to the spot. Inside the building was Supt. Frederick L. Mathias, who had charge of the construction for Architects Harvey and Gooch. He was bleeding very profusely from a bullet wound in the abdomen. A number of badly scared workmen were lurking behind pillars and piles of wood and brick, while still more crowded the temporary stairs leading to the second story, attracted by pistol shots and the excitement from below, the policemen were told that Mathias' assailant was concealed behind a pile of bricks in the rear of the building. An officer advanced towards the man's hiding place and ordered him to come out. A pistol shot rang out and a bullet grazed the cheek of the policeman. The officer mounted another pile of bricks and opened a fusilade in the direction of the man's hiding place, which the latter steadily returned. Finally the crank gave an unearthly scream, jumped from his hiding place and fired three shots in quick succession at the policeman, all of which missed their mark. Officers Giblin and Cornell rushed upon him, seized the pistol and bore the man to the ground. Even after being disarmed the man fought desperately and the policemen had to use their clubs to overcome him. Mathias will die.

WORLD'S FAIR CLOSED.

The Great Exposition Ended with Unostentatious Ceremonies.

The official life of the World's Fair has ended. Monday evening was to have been one of gaiety and dazzling brilliancy, but the death of Mayor Harrison changed all. The meeting at Festival Hall during the afternoon was brief. The audience was detained just long enough to hear an earnest prayer by Rev. Barrows, a few explanatory remarks regarding the change of program by President Palmer, the reading of an appropriate speech by President Higginbotham and resolutions of sympathy regarding Carter Harrison's untimely end. Mr. Higginbotham began in a clear, firm voice, which grew husky and trembled for a moment with emotion.

The Fair was declared closed by Thomas W. Palmer, President of the National Commission, in the following words: "It was intended to close this Fair simultaneously with the sound of this gavel, the firing of artillery and the lowering of flags. All this has been changed by the sad circumstance which brings us together now. I announce that when the sun sets, the closing will be marked only by a salute and the hauling down of the flag. When that takes place, I declare in obedience to the act of Congress, that the exposition is officially closed."

Bombs Made of Sawdust.

Connersville, (Ind.) special: The discovery of a bomb made from a piece of gas pipe about a foot long near the door of the treasurer's office by Sheriff McCready caused great excitement. The missile was neatly sealed and had a slow fuse a foot long which bore evidence of having been ignited. The officials were greatly agitated over the discovery and an investigation followed. It was not till late in the day, after the Sheriff had made a trip to the country and tried to ignite the alleged bomb, that it was discovered to be a practical joke, perpetrated upon the Sheriff. Later in the evening a man dropped a similar missile on the floor of a store and caused a precipitate rush to the street by the crowd in the store. The pipe contained sawdust.

Admiral Stanton's Blunder.

Washington special: Admiral Stanton's blunder in saluting the rebel squadron before Rio was made still more inexplicable recently by a perusal of the roster on the Newark, his flagship, which showed that at least two men of standing on board are well acquainted with the intricacies of international law and presumably knew that the salute to the rebel fleet was an affront to the regular Government of Brazil. This knowledge seems to confirm the almost general belief at the Navy Department that Admiral Stanton has some reasonable explanation to offer for his unfortunate action.

Bold Robbery.

Pittsburg special: While driving to Guyasta a few miles west of here, W. H. McGuire, a sewing machine agent, was attacked and robbed by four masked men. After taking his money, amounting to $65, and his gold watch, the robbers bucked and gagged McGuire and tied him to the seat of the wagon. The horse was then frightened and started for Guyasta at a terrific rate, but before any damage was done the rig was stopped by two bicyclists and McGuire released. There is no clue to the robbers.

'Twill Come Off.

Champion James J. Corbett has received word from the Olympic Club at New Orleans that they would hang up a purse of $20,000 for the Corbett-Mitchell glove contest, and telegraphed his acceptance on the condition that the club deposit $10,000 guarantee for the contest to come off. Corbett said: "The purse is a smaller one than that which I fought Sullivan for; but no matter. Mitchell must not be disappointed."

Smallpox by Mail.

Some person in Muncie, Ind., sent Marshal John Woods of Celina, Ohio, some smallpox scabs inclosed in a very degrading letter. Marshal Woods would not permit any one from Muncie to stop off at Celina, and it is thought that some one there has tried to spread the dread disease in that city and resorted to the above method. The Post-office authorities have taken the matter in hand, and will make an effort to trace the letter to the sender.

Spanish Forced to Retreat.

Madrid special: The Minister of War has received a telegraphic message from Melilla, saying the Moors in great force opened fire on the Spaniards, who were working upon the fort now in course of erection, and their fire was so well directed that the Spaniards were obliged to retreat, which they did, however, in good order, and not until they had inflicted considerable loss upon the enemy.

The Pope to Archbishop Satolli.

The Pope has been exchanging views recently with Archbishop Satolli papal delegate to the church in the United States, concerning the Roman Catholic University in Washington. He has been irritated, it is said, by the men who are instigating adverse criticism of the University, and will soon give the institution evidence of his support and satisfaction with its work.

Sewer-pipe Concerns Combine.

Bellaire (Ohio) special: All the sewer-pipe manufacturing companies are to unite in a joint stock company, to be incorporated under the laws of Ohio. The capital will be $1,000,000. It is claimed that the combination of the Ohio potteries is a necessity to compete with the Akron combine. The latter threatens to dissolve and break down prices.

Young Lady Jumps from a Train.

While coming out from Chicago on the Denver limited recently Miss Georgia Wright, who resides at Rochelle, Ill., was carried by the latter place. She did not notice it until near Franklin Grove, when she rushed out of the car and jumped. The train was stopped, and the young lady was found severely injured.

Two Indicted.

The Noble County, Indiana, grand jury has returned an indictment against John Connors and Eva Flint for complicity in the Kessler train robbery. Thus far they are the only persons under arrest for that crime. They have been in jail at Albion for some time and will not be tried until the December term of court.

Senator Morrill in His Seat.

Senator Morrill of Vermont, the oldest member of the Senate, appeared in the senate the other day after an absence of two months, and was warmly welcomed by his colleagues on both sides of the chamber.

Good Templars Under the Ban of the Pope

According to information from Rome the congregation of the Holy Inquisition has decided that the order of Good Templars must be counted among the societies which Catholics are not permitted to join.

Movements of the Warships.

The Navy Department is informed of the arrival of the flagship Chicago at Barcelona, Spain, from Mataga, and the cruiser San Francisco at Key West, Fla.

Killed by the Cars.

HARRISON IS SLAIN.

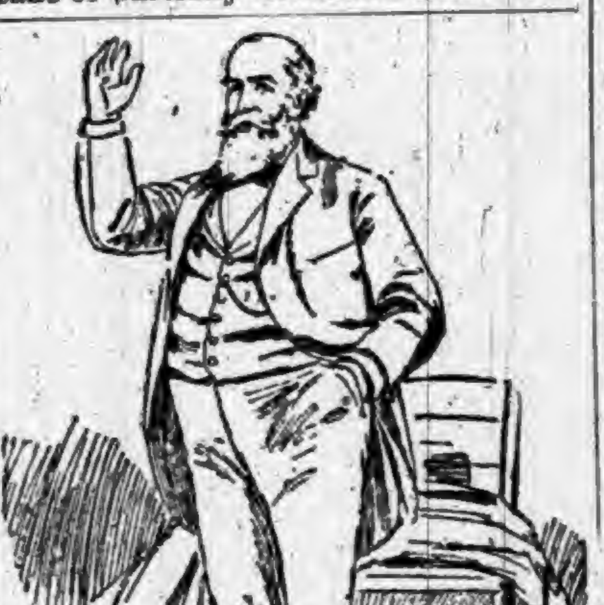
Chicago's Mayor Victim of a Murderer's Bullets.

SHOT DEAD AT HOME.

THE ASSASSIN WAS A CRAZY OFFICE-SEEKER.

Chief Executive of the World's Fair City Called from Slumber to Death—Three Bullets Fired at Him in His Own Hallway—No Word of Warning Is Spoken by the Murderer—The Station Besieged by Indignant Crowds—Chicagoans Astounded by the News of the Killing.

Carter Henry Harrison, Mayor of the city of Chicago, has been assassinated—shot down in the hallway of his own home by an irresponsible crank. This is a shocking announcement to go before the world in these closing days of the Columbian Exposition. Just when the name of Chicago is on the tongues of all men in every clime, when every mention of the name brings pleasant memories to millions of people, it is a cruel fate that associates the name of the city with the crime of assassination. It was the cherished ambition of Mr. Harrison to serve as the World's Fair Mayor. He had almost completed the six months covering the period of the Fair; the papers of the morning of his death had announced the date of his marriage to a most estimable lady; he was at the proudest moment of a most extraordinary career when cut down by the cruel shot of an assassin. The story of the murder seems to indicate that it was committed by an insane or partially demented man. The act was cold-blooded and deliberate. The man had come to the Harrison mansion bent on murder, and whether actuated by motives the birth of an unbalanced mind or not, he did his fiendish work well.



CARTER H. HARRISON.

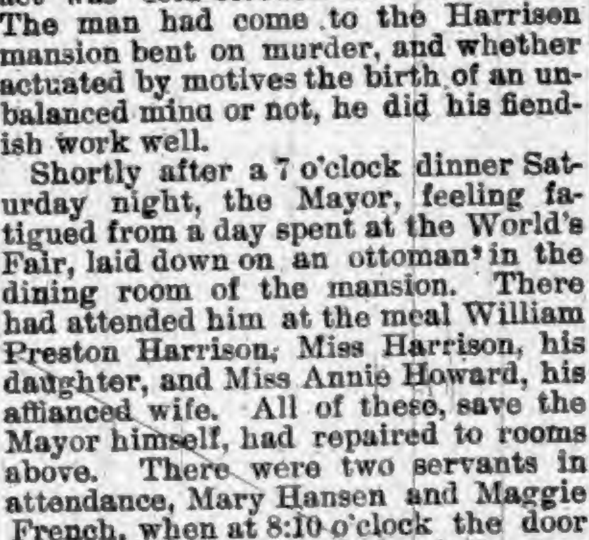
Shortly after a 7 o'clock dinner Saturday night, the Mayor, feeling fatigued from a day spent at the World's Fair, laid down on an ottoman in the dining room of the mansion. There had attended him at the meal William Preston Harrison, Miss Harrison, his daughter, and Miss Annie Howard, his affianced wife. All of these, save the Mayor himself, had repaired to rooms above. There were two servants in attendance, Mary Hansen and Maggie French, when at 8:10 o'clock the door bell rang, and the former of the two servants named went to the door. A man giving his name as Eugene Patrick Prendergast inquired for the Mayor and was admitted into the hallway. Mr. Harrison came forward at the call of his name and met the caller near the front door of the residence. Without a moment's warning Prendergast drew a revolver and fired three shots in rapid succession. The first shot struck Mr. Harrison in the abdomen, near the stomach, and he threw up his hands and staggered backward. As he did so, another bullet hit him in the left breast near the shoulder and over the region of the heart. Not content with his deadly work the assassin again fired, piercing the left hand of his victim as he sank to the floor mortally wounded.



MISS ANNIE HOWARD.
Carter Harrison's Betrothed.

Preston Harrison, son of the Mayor, when the first shot was fired was in his room on the second floor. He ran down with all haste and rushed after the man as he left the hall. Prendergast fired a shot at Mr. Harrison, but missed him. The assassin, having completed his work, turned back to the door, the butler of the Harrison household at his heels, fled across the lawn, out of the gateway, and out of sight. The police were quickly on the spot.

Preston Harrison was soon at the side of his prostrate father, the latter pale and uttering hardly articulate groans.

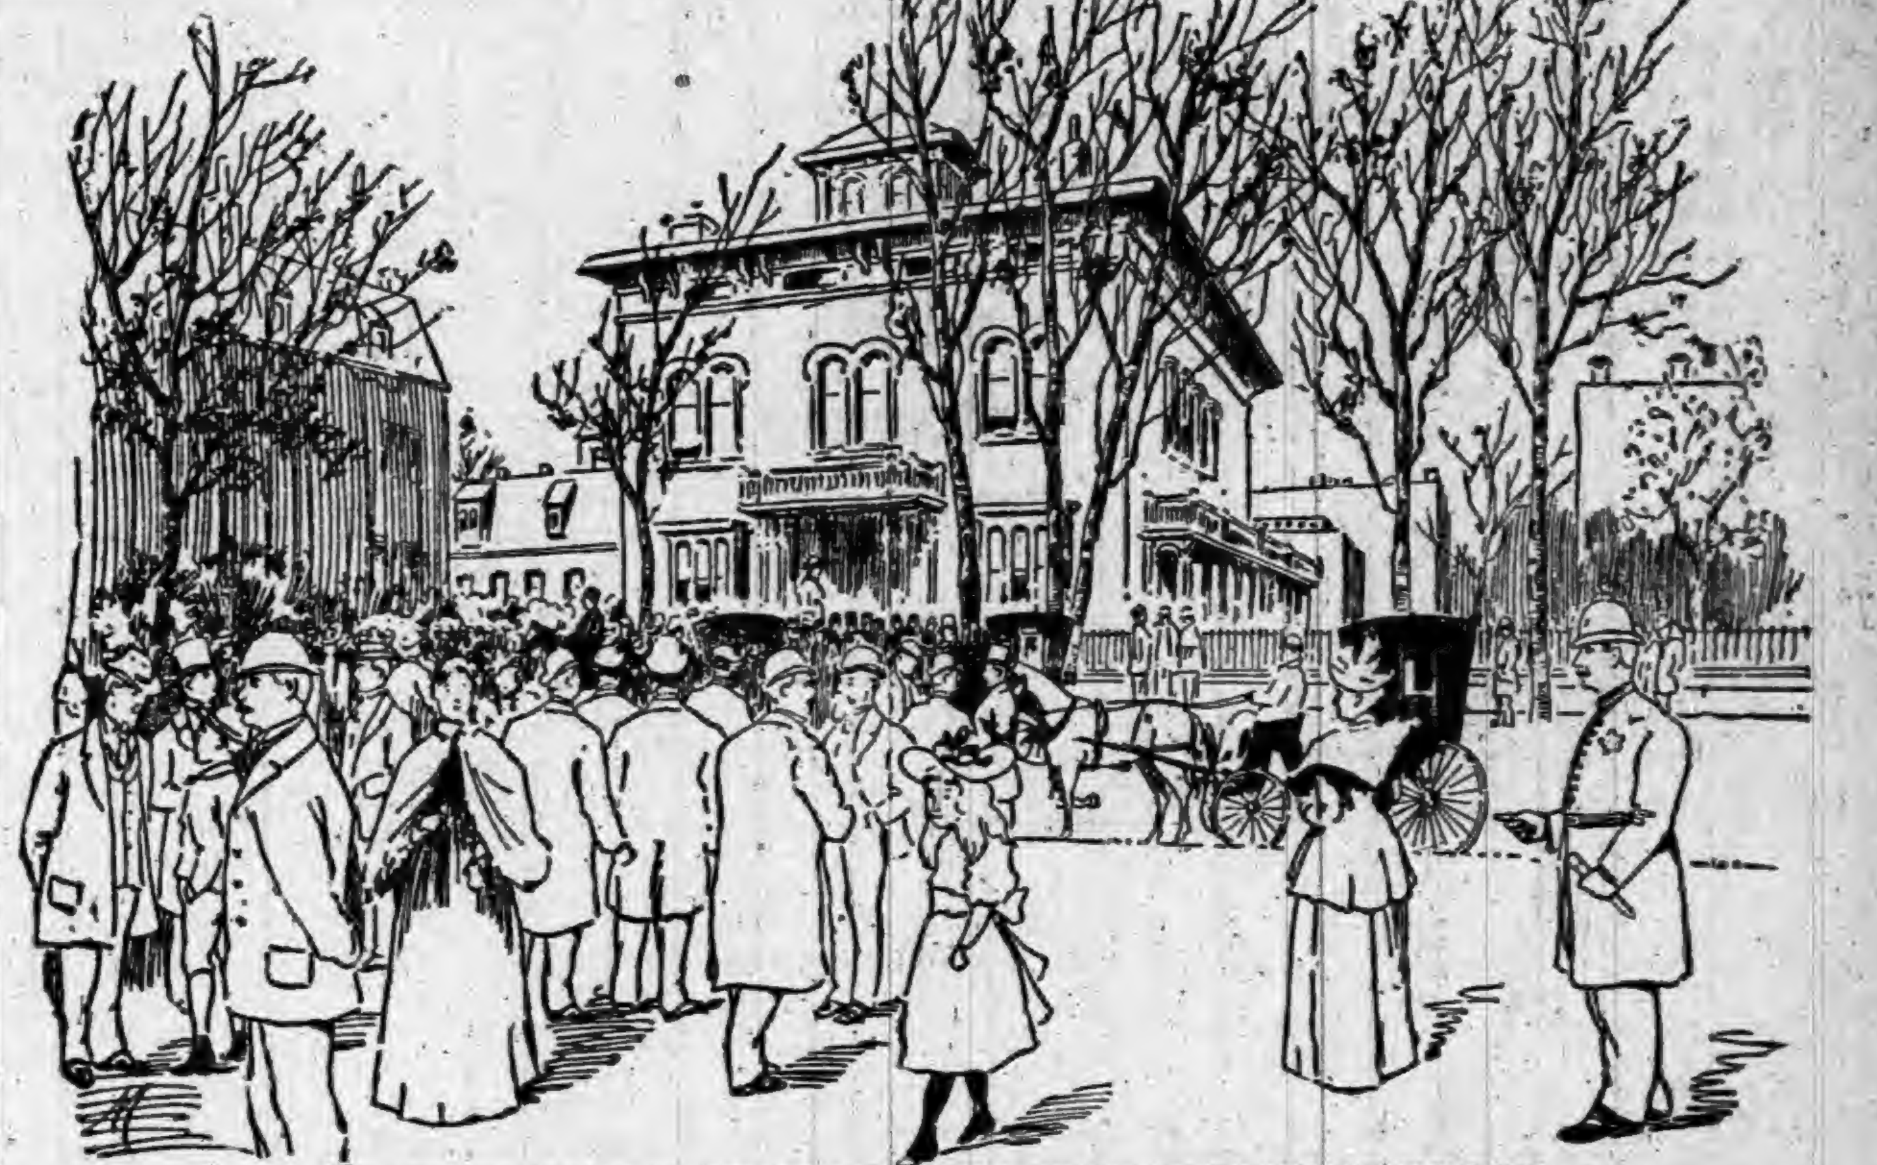
"I'm shot," moaned the Mayor. "Get a doctor.

Dr. Foster, who lives half a square removed from the Harrisons, hastened to the side of the wounded man. A hurried examination, during which the patient gritted his teeth and bore up heroically, and Dr. Foster announced the sufferer beyond surgical aid.

"I've been shot," muttered Chicago's chief executive, and I am going to die. I know it. I cannot live." "You're not hurt, father," returned the son, reassuringly. "You'll be all right," with a feigned smile. But the Mayor had caught the look of discouragement from the doctor, and added his own apprehensions thereto. "Yes, I am going to die," firmly, and then, modulating his intonation somewhat, he gasped: "Where's Annie?" This reference to her who was soon to become his wife brought the tears to his eyes, and, growing faint at heart as in body, he fell back on the rudely improvised couch of rugs. "Where's Annie?" he repeated, his voice now almost still. A convulsive throb, his voice failed him, he choked up with the blood that was forcing up from the awful gape in his abdomen, a last look about him, and the Mayor of the great Western city turned his head slightly to the right and gasped his last.

Betrothed Sobs by Her Dead.

A few minutes later Miss Howard rushed in, distracted. She begged to be allowed to see the man she loved. She threw herself on his bleeding body and sobbed as if her heart would break. Her piteous cries brought tears to the eyes of those near her. Preston Harrison alone stood dry-eyed. He seemed to be transfixed with horror. Miss Howard wept over her dead lover like one distrait. She had almost to be torn from the body. Mrs. Owsley, daughter of the Mayor, uttered heartrending cries over her father. Overcome with grief Miss Sophie Harrison fainted near her father's body. The three women were taken up-stairs and the doctors turned their attention to them.



SCENE AT THE HARRISON RESIDENCE DURING THE INQUEST SUNDAY MORNING.

There was a sad scene between those three women upstairs. Mrs. Harrison, Jr., also arrived, distracted at the fate of her husband's father. The four women wept together, consoling each other by their tears. Miss Howard refused all consolation. The name of her dead lover was on her lips, and she cried that she might die and go with him. Despairing wails and hysterical groans, prayers, pleadings for the restoration of her lover to life, imprecations on the assassin's head, all followed in disjointed and disconnected sentences. The physicians tried to calm her, but she would not listen to the words of solace and comfort, and continued her strange actions until the doctors concluded to destroy her ability to brood with a potent and powerful anæsthetic. The drug had its effect, and soon Miss Howard fell off in a troubled slumber. Unconscious of his father's fate, Carter Harrison Jr. was on his way from the World's Fair when Prendergast fired the fatal shots. The news had traveled fast, and before the son had started on his journey west he heard of the terrible fate that had befallen his father.

The Assassin Surrenders.

Thirty minutes later Prendergast, excited, out of breath, and panting from his long run, bounded up the steps of the Desplaines street station, nearly two miles distant, and, handing a revolver across the desk to Sergeant Barber, exclaimed: "I shot Mayor Harrison—I want to give myself up."

The officers were startled by the exclamation, but, being accustomed to erratic visitors, were not inclined to take the man's words seriously until they saw that he carried a revolver in his hand. They immediately placed the man under arrest and took the weapon from him. The man said his name was Patrick Eugene Prendergast and that he had shot the Mayor because he had betrayed him. "I wanted to be made Corporation Counsel," he said. All the time he acted with coolness and showed no signs of excitement. He was only about twenty minutes at the Desplaines Street Station when Chief of Police Brennan arrived and ordered his removal to the Central Station, as evidences were shown that his stay there was dangerous. He preserved his coolness on the journey to the City Hall. He repeated the statement that he shot the Mayor because he would not appoint him Corporation Counsel. He said he was 25 years old and that he worked a morning paper route for a livelihood. According to his statement he bought the revolver in the afternoon, intending to shoot the Mayor unless he was given some satisfaction to his repeated demands for an appointment. "I went to Mayor Harrison's house," he said, "and asked him what he was going to do for me. He would do nothing I wished and what he had promised, and I drew my revolver and shot him. I have done some work in a political way in my ward for the last few campaigns and was for Harrison, and because of my influence Harrison promised me a position if he was elected in the last campaign. I was asked what I wanted and I said that I had a scheme for the elevation of the railroad tracks. I wanted to be Corporation Counsel so that I could push this scheme. I was told that I might have the position. Since election I have asked for the office again and again, and have been put off repeatedly. The office was given to another. The Mayor had betrayed me, and I resolved to have revenge. I have had it." It was learned that Prendergast had for some time been pestering the Mayor with letters asking for the position of corporation counsel. The letters are described as the production of a person of unbalanced mind.

Crowd at the House.

Friends had rushed to the house as soon as the news spread around the neighborhood, to offer what help they could. The police alarm had brought wagons dashing to the house from all directions. It was a riot alarm, for the horses sped like lightning along the streets, landing many officers at the house. But the deed was done when the officers arrived. An angry crowd gathered about the house and there were threats of lynching if the assassin could be found. When the news came that he had been arrested, one man declared that he would lead the crowd to the Desplaines Street Station and drag the murderer out. When it was known that the Mayor had been assassinated the whole city was aroused. The people came from all directions, both in cabs and on foot. They gathered on the sidewalk in front of the house, and crowded into the large front yard. A few tried to enter the house. The police, however, prevented this, and soon a guard was set at the door. Then the yard was cleared. Still the crowd lingered, pressing against the iron fence.

Politics Forgotten in Sympathy.

The news spread to a big Republican campaign meeting being held at the North Side Turner Hall and the meeting terminated suddenly. The men were wild enough to rush to the jail and hang the murderer to the nearest lamp post. Another crowd gathered around the Desplaines street station, but the police were all out and the men were kept back.

Prendergast was taken to the City Hall and examined by Inspector Shea and three other officers. He gave a clear statement concerning his deed. From his own account it was a cold-blooded action, deliberately planned and carried out. Here, again, another crowd waited to catch a glimpse of the murderer. After the examination the murderer was kept at the City Hall under a heavy guard, to prevent any demonstration. The crowd soon dispersed, but it would have boded ill for Prendergast if he had been taken back to the Desplaines Street Station.

Threats of Lynching.

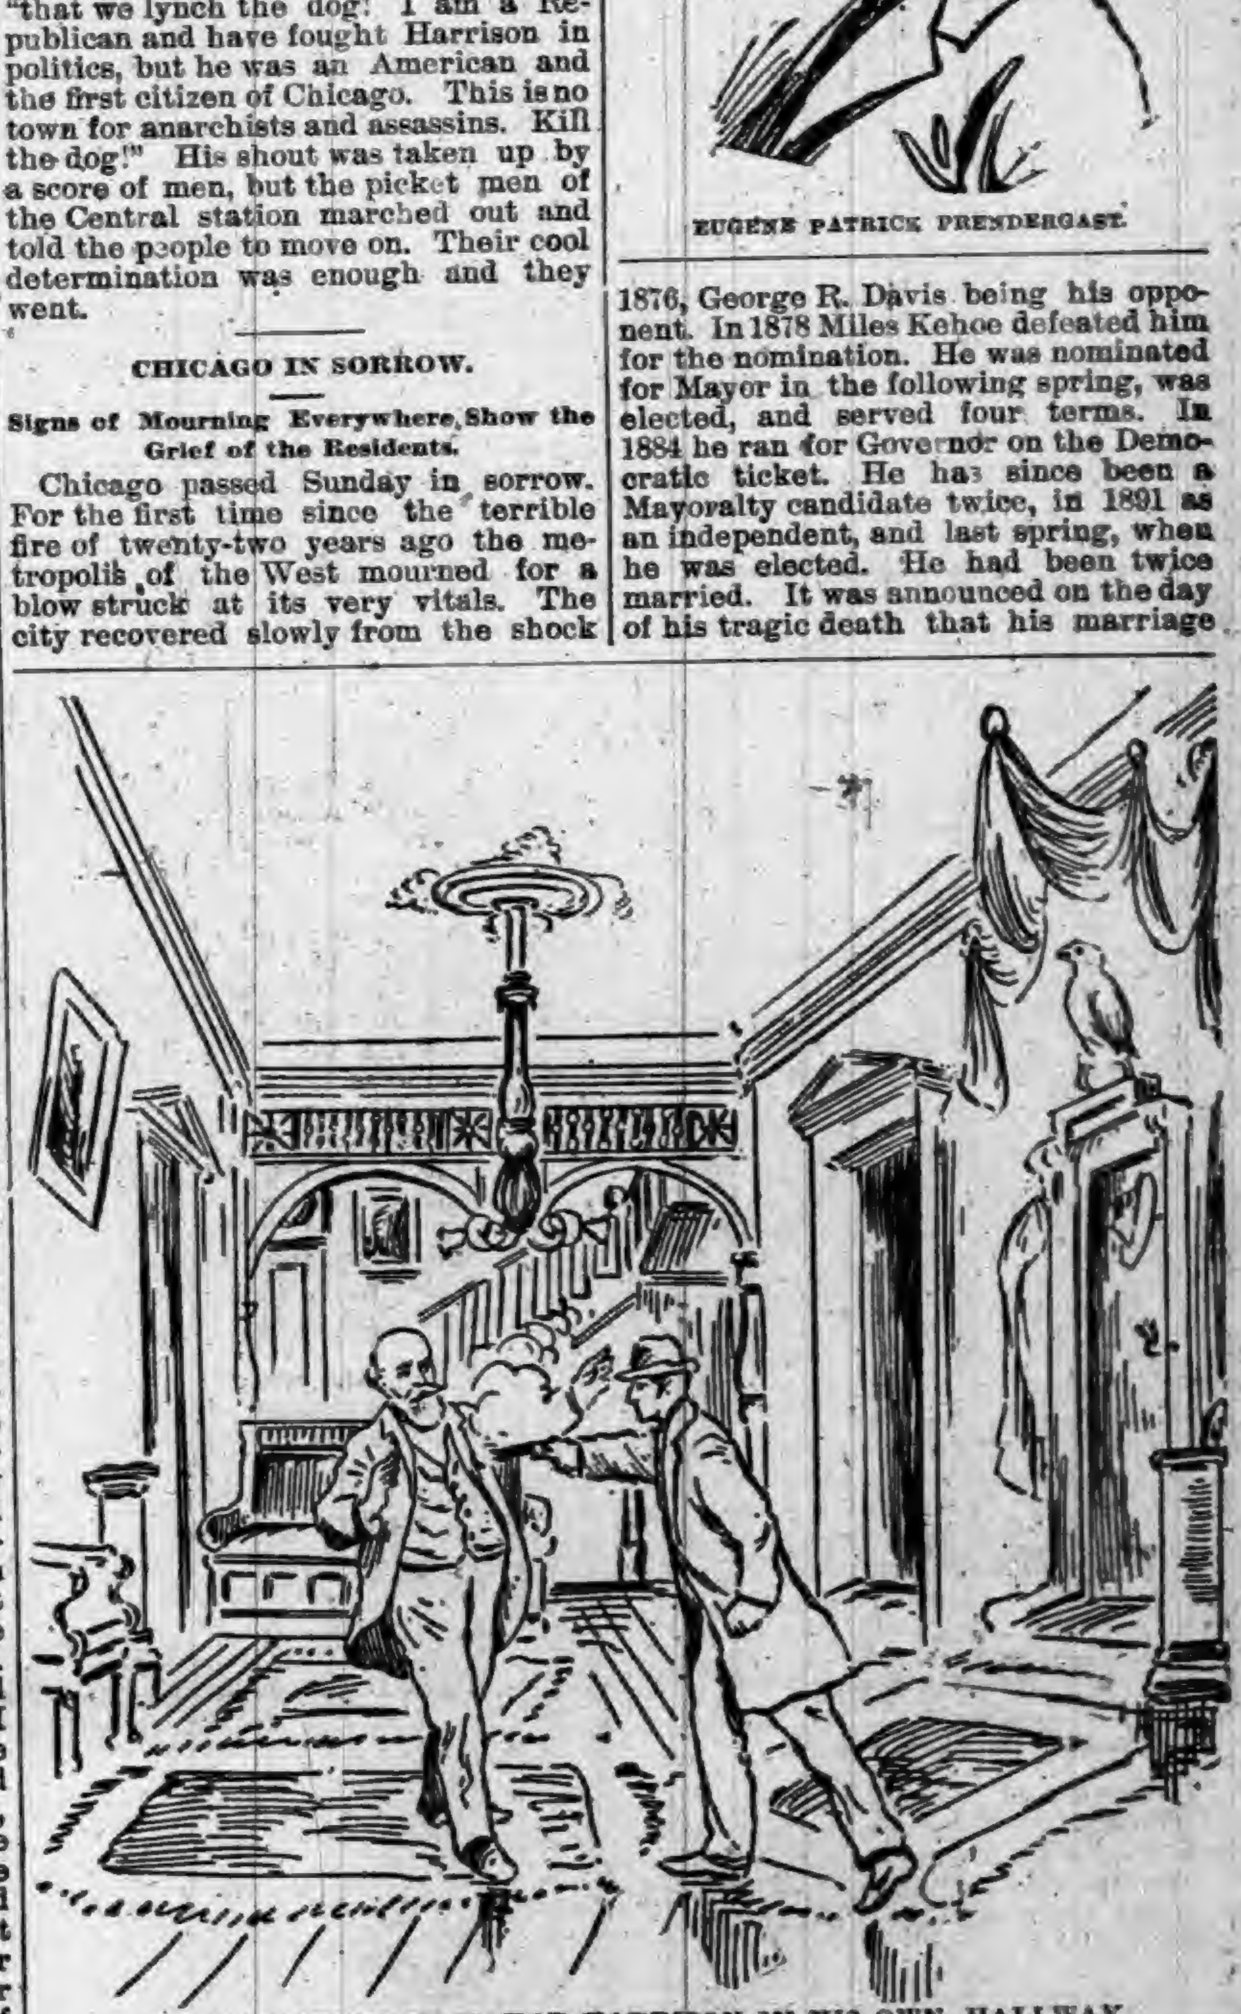
While the civilized world wondered at the infamy of the deed and the law-abiding citizens paced the streets and asked each whether lynch law was not justifiable under certain circumstances, the cringing wretch cowered in a cell at the Central Station. He had made a bold front before Chief Brennan and Inspector Shea, but when thrust back into his cell he slunk into a corner like a beast at bay. It was nearly midnight then. A crowd had gathered in the street. It gathered with the primal object of hearing authentic news of the assassination and when the verification of the rumor came to them there were hotheads who talked of lynching.

Never in the history of the city since the great calamity of 1871 were such serious threats of lynching indulged in as on Saturday night and Sunday morning. In a crowd of men gathered at the corner of La Salle and Washington streets on Sunday morning was a burly Irishman who towered above every other man. "I say," he shouted, "that we lynch the dog! I am a Republican and have fought Harrison in politics, but he was an American and the first citizen of Chicago. This is no town for anarchists and assassins. Kill the dog!" His shout was taken up by a score of men, but the picket men of the Central station marched out and told the people to move on. Their cool determination was enough and they went.

CHICAGO IN SORROW.

Signs of Mourning Everywhere, Show the Grief of the Residents.

Chicago passed Sunday in sorrow. For the first time since the terrible fire of twenty-two years ago the metropolis of the West mourned for a blow struck at its very vitals. The city recovered slowly from the shock of the assassination. When the dawn first broke far across the gray waters of Lake Michigan the new day pushed away the darkness of a night stained by so black a crime, and was welcomed with relief by the thousands of citizens whom the excitement of the murder had kept from their accustomed beds. But the cold and cloudy morn came as a harbinger of evil to the vast majority of the residents. The hoarse shouts of the tireless newsboys as they penetrated every street and avenue of the city, far and near, brought the awful tidings for the first time to hundreds of thousand who had gone to their homes Saturday night before the rumors of the assassination reached the downtown hotels and [illegible]. Awakened by these unwonted [illegible] all Chicago knew long before church time of the irreparable disaster that had befallen it on the night before. The churches were all crowded in the morning with the regular parishioners and strangers eager to hear whatever eulogies or other references that might be made by the pastors to the dead Mayor.



ASSASSINATION OF MAYOR HARRISON IN HIS OWN HALLWAY.

The Inquest.

Five bullet wounds were found in the body of the murdered Mayor. A coroner's jury, composed of C. C. Kohlsaat, Ulric King, S. A. Scribner, W. J. Chalmers, P. R. O'Brien, and Charles F. Elmes, impaneled by Coroner McHale, rendered a verdict of murder without delay. The inquest was held at the Harrison mansion Sunday morning. The assassin was present under a heavy guard and a line of stalwart policemen surrounded the house guarding every gate and door. There were but few witnesses to examine, and the proceedings occupied a short time. Previous to the inquest a post mortem examination had been made, and the testimony of the surgeons was the only information differing from that printed in Sunday's papers.

Excepting a technical description of the wounds little was added to the information already at the disposal of officers of the law. The verdict recommended that Prendergast be held for the murder until discharged by due process of law.

Sketch of Carter Harrison's Career.

According to a recent biographer, Carter Harrison was born in Kentucky in 1825, but traced his ancestry back to Cromwell's Lieutenant General. His official life began as County Commissioner in 1871. In 1872 he ran for Congress against Jasper D. Ward, and was defeated. In 1874 he ran again, and was elected. He was re-elected in 1876, George R. Davis being his opponent. In 1878 Miles Kehoe defeated him for the nomination. He was nominated for Mayor in the following spring, was elected, and served four terms. In 1884 he ran for Governor on the Democratic ticket. He has since been a Mayoralty candidate twice, in 1891 as an independent, and last spring, when he was elected. He had been twice married. It was announced on the day of his tragic death that his marriage to Miss Howard, of New Orelans, La., would take place at Biloxi, Miss., Nov. 16.

The Story of a Woman's Atonement,

by Charlotte M. Braeme.

CHAPTER VI.

Poets and artists all went into raptures over Crown Leighton. It was the most picturesque as well as the most magnificent of mansions. Excepting, perhaps, its royal palaces, England has nothing more beautiful or more superb, and it derived its name from the fact of its having been built in the reign of Charles II., whose favorite retreat it was.

The late Earl—Stephen—had been quite indifferent to all. No one knew what had gone wrong in his life. He was an only child and succeeded when very young; for a few years he had done as the rest of the world does, gone to London, ridden, danced, flirted, and then a sudden gloom had fallen over him. He came back to Crown Leighton; he avoided society as much as he had hitherto sought it; he looked coldly on friends and neighbors; he did what no Charnleigh had ever done before—placed his estates in the hands of a steward, or agent, making only one request, which was that he should not be annoyed with any consultations or arrangements. He shut himself up at Crown Leighton, and never cared to leave it.

He did not neglect the place; a large establishment of servants was kept there, with carriages and horses that he never used—a whole retinue of people whose faces he never saw. He gave orders that everything should be preserved in the same perfect state as that in which he had found it—those orders were carefully obeyed.

He lived until he was 56, never taking the least active part in the arrangements of his estate or household. Mr. Dunscombe attended to all. The only time he ever left the place was when his confidential legal adviser and trusted counsellor, Mr. Rawlings, died; then he went to London, and placed his affairs in the hands of Messrs. Clements & Matthews; and again, when the old family retainer, Morgan, who had been butler at Crown Leighton for more than forty years, died, the Earl left his home until after the funeral.

Several times Mr. Clements had tried his best to break through the wall of reserve with which his employer had hedged himself round, and suggested to him the propriety of making a will; he was invariably repulsed with the haughtiest and most freezing words.

"There will be a terrible mess some day," he was wont to observe to Mr. Dunscombe, "and twenty lines might settle matters. Captain Paul Flemyng ought to be found."

But if ever, in any unusual moment of bravery, he named the young Captain, Lord Charnleigh gave him instantly to understand that the settlement of his affairs was his own business entirely, and the lawyer dared say no more.

Mr. Clements' predictions were fulfilled at last. Just before Christmas Lord Charnleigh was seized with a sudden and dangerous illness. He died almost before medical aid could be summoned, and then the lawyer was almost beside himself.

There were no instructions; no will could be found; there was no heir expectant. Mr. Clements sent for Captain Flemyng, but he was unable to leave his regiment; besides, it was so very uncertain whether he was heir of Charnleigh that he did not like to assume authority; neither did any one like to place him in office, lest there should be the pain of deposing him. A grand council was held. It was arranged that Stephen, Earl of Charnleigh, should be buried with all honor, and then immediate search should be made for his nearest relative.

It was done, and, after a painful and most laborious investigation, it was clearly ascertained that the nearest living relative of the dead Earl was Leonie Rayner, henceforward to be known to the world as "Leonie, Countess of Charnleigh."

CHAPTER VII.

On this bright June morning Crown Leighton seems to be wearing its fairest dress. For six long months the place has been dreary and desolate, given up to the rule of servants, uncared for save by those whose care was hired. All was different to-day; from roof to basement the grand old mansion had been set in perfect and picturesque order. There was no trace of confusion; the flowers were all blooming, the birds singing, the fountains throwing up their silvery spray, the long white lace hangings drawn aside, and the sumptuous rooms filled with warmth and fragrance.

Flags and banners waved over the tall ancestral trees, bands of music were stationed in the park, the bells of Leighton church rang out with jubilant music such as had not sounded from the old gray spire for many a year.

The tenantry, the numerous bands of laborers, the poor dependents and pensioners, the large household of Crown Leighton, were all assembled to welcome the young countess home.

Mr. Clements was to bring her, and with her was to come Lady Fanshawe, a distant cousin of the late earl's mother, a stately, aristocratic dame, who for the family's sake had consented to live as duenna and chaperon with the young countess.

Orders had been given to prepare rooms for three ladies, the third being Miss Templeton, whose affection for her once despised governess-pupil had reached such a height that she could not bear to be parted from her, and had accepted an invitation to attend Lady Charnleigh on her triumphal coming home.

The June sun was pouring down a flood of rich golden noontide light, incense seemed to rise from the fragrant flowers, and the bells were pealing merrily, when the delighted crowd first caught sight of the carriage. It was driven slowly along—perhaps Mr. Clements had ordered it, that the eyes of the people might dwell with delight on the lovely face of the young girl.

Then well-trained servants came to the carriage-door and opened it. As the young girl descended there arose another ringing cheer, the bells pealed out afresh, the music came in strong, sweet waves of sound.

"Welcome home—welcome, Lady Charnleigh!" the people shouted, and she stood quite still on the broad stone step. Her face had grown pale with emotion, but there was no sign of weakness or of tears.

Then Mr. Clements took her hand and led her forward; in his heart he felt that it was a lonely coming home for her, with no friend, no relative, no mother or sister to meet her on the threshold of her new life, and bid her "God-speed."

He took her hand and led her to where the June sunbeams fell on her.

"Lady Charnleigh bids me thank you," he said, "for the welcome you have given her; and she bids me say that the nearest and dearest interest in her heart will be yours."

"Heaven do to me as I do to them," he heard her say, gently. Then she smiled and bowed with a grace that seemed all her own, and the great doors were thrown open.

Again Mr. Clements was master of the ceremonies. The housekeeper, Mrs. Fearon, made her most respectful salutation to Lady Charnleigh, and mentioned her long years of service. Lady Charnleigh held out her hand with a smile, and so won her heart forever. Then the butler, Mr. Clarkson, came forward, and received the gracious words with which the new mistress of Crown Leighton inaugurated her reign.

I thank you for your welcome," she said, in a voice as clear and sweet as the sound of a silver bell. "I am quite sure you will all do your duty to me, and I, in return, will do mine to you."

After which little impromptu speech there was not a servant in Crown Leighton who would not have laid down their life for the kindly young countess.

CHAPTER VIII.

Four hours later Leonie, Lady Charnleigh, was seated in the sumptuous drawing-room at Crown Leighton. She had in some measure recovered from the fierce, wild excitement of finding herself mistress of that magnificent home.

A recherche dinner had been served in the dining-room; the gold and silver plate—the pride of the Charnleighs for many generations—had been used, and looked at in wonder. Before she took her seat as head of the table, she went to Lady Fanshawe with a sweet humility that would have touched any one.

"I know nothing," she said, "of the little ceremonies and the etiquette needful to be understood by the lady of such a house as this. Will you teach me?"

Lady Fanshawe looked earnestly at her, to see whether the humility was real or feigned; then she fell to admiring her young relative when she found that the wealthy heiress, the mistress of all the grandeur around, was anxious and willing to be taught as a child.

The result of Lady Fanshawe's lesson was that, when the young Countess of Charnleigh afterward took her seat, she made no mistakes, but went through the ordeal as though she had been head of the establishment for twenty years. Even Mr. Clements, who gave her credit for being one of the most gifted of girls, could not understand how she had so quickly fallen into the ways and manners of the elite of society.

"Women so soon adapt themselves to new circumstances," he thought. "In her place I should have been awkward and ill at ease."

That ordeal was over. No young lady born to be a duchess could have gone through it with greater dignity and grace; and now the ladies had retired to the drawing-room, while Mr. Clements lingered over a bottle of claret of choice vintage.

The sun was still shining, and the odor of flowers came in through the open windows. Lady Charnleigh was seated with a book in her hands, but she had neither read a line nor turned a page; her beautiful violet eyes were turned on the glorious and well-kept lawns.

"You found everything in order, I hope, Lady Charnleigh?" said Lady Fanshawe. "The young person I engaged as your maid has been in the Duchess of Moretoun's service; she will suit you, I think."

"She seems to understand her duties," was the reply, and the faintest shadow of a smile rippled over the lovely lips. Only two short weeks ago she had assisted in dressing others; now the maid of a duchess was hardly thought good enough for her.

"The evening is still so bright, and will be so long," said Miss Templeton, "we might go round the house if Lady Charnleigh is not too tired."

"There is nothing I should like so much," responded the young Countess, rising from her seat.

Mrs. Fearon was summoned, and Mr. Clements, hearing what was proposed, offered to join the expedition.

Presently the party went to the library, which was said to contain some of the choicest literary gems in England, and afterward visited the sunny rooms that looked toward the west—the suite of apartments set aside for the use of visitors.

Here Mr. Clements left them to hold a long conversation on business matters with Mr. Dunscombe, and the ladies went to examine what was perhaps one of the greatest curiosities of Crown Leighton—the enormous wardrobe, containing the treasures in silks, satins, velvets, and priceless lace that had belonged to former Ladies Charnleigh. There were jewel-cases filled with precious stones, old-fashioned in setting, and almost priceless in value. Miss Templeton looked until she declared her eyes ached, and she could look no longer.

"This," said the housekeeper, opening the door of a small room, "was the late Earl's favorite apartment; he preferred it to any other."

Lady Charnleigh wondered why. It was not very cheerful, nor was it luxurious. Just at that moment the western sunbeams filled it, and they fell on a picture of such grave and vivid beauty that she was startled by it.

It was the portrait of a young man; but the face struck her as no other face had ever done. She could have imagined Sir Lancelot had such a one, or any of her favorite heroes; it was dark, grand, passionate, and noble, with a melancholy, patrician beauty words could never paint; the eyes were dark and dreamy, with fire and passion in their depths; the brow was a square, Grecian one, with clustering hair brushed from it; the lips were firmly closed and grave, yet with lines round them that spoke of smiles sweet and gracious as a woman's; the whole face gave the idea of veiled passion and sleeping strength, or magnificent manhood not yet fully developed.

Leonie, Lady Charnleigh, stood almost motionless before this picture; its dark, passionate beauty enchained her. There was nothing about it to denote whom it represented. She turned to Mrs. Fearon, who stood ready to answer any questions that might be asked.

"What picture is that?" she inquired.

There was a half-reluctant expression on the housekeeper's face as she replied:

"It is the portrait, I believe, of a relative of the late Earl's."

The young Countess looked at it again.

"But who is it? Is he living? What is his name?"

"It is Captain Paul Flemyng; he is an officer in the army," was the reply, still reluctantly given.

Lady Charnleigh did not seek to repress the cry that rose to her lips.

"Captain Paul Flemyng!"

She looked again at the handsome face. This was the man, then, who but for her would have been Earl of Charnleigh, whom she had unconsciously and innocently deprived of this princely inheritance. She looked with additional interest at the beautiful face.

"He is very handsome," she said to herself, gently. "He would have made a noble Earl."

Even as she said the words she was conscious that the housekeeper's eyes were fixed with some curiosity on her face, and she turned abruptly away.

Many times that evening her thoughts went back to that splendid face, worthy of Velasquez. But on the day following she found no more time for dreaming. Her table was covered with cards; the drawing-room was never without visitors. The full tide of life had set in, and Leonie, Countess of Charnleigh, woke to find herself famous.

CHAPTER IX.

The sun was shining brilliantly over the blue sea and the white rocks of Malta. The day was warm and sultry, the air heavy with the scent of flowers and the odor of the sea. It was a day when work is a toil and idleness a pleasure. Two gentlemen were seated on a ledge of rock overlooking the heaving waters.

"I never could bear much heat," said one of them, Major St. John; "I hope our regiment will not be ordered to India. I would rather go to the North Pole."

"All places are alike to me," observed his companion, Captain Paul Flemyng, serenely, "and all climates the same."

"I could be as calmly indifferent if I had the prospect of an earldom with a good many thousand per annum. Philosophy, under such circumstances, is no virtue."

"I am not at all sure of my prospects," commented Capt. Flemyng; "they seem very uncertain. At any time I may hear that some one has been discovered whose claims are nearer than mine; then there will be a long farewell to all my greatness."

He could not have spoken more indifferently had the subject been one foreign to his interest. Maj. St. John laughed.

"You do not seem very anxious about it," he said.

The dark, handsome face flushed, and then grew pale; a light gleamed in the dark eyes, and then died away.

"Do not misjudge me," he rejoined. "Crown Leighton is a grand inheritance; Charnleigh is a glorious name. If they should both be mine, no man would be prouder of them. I would live so as to do honor to them. I would make a good and noble use of the vast wealth intrusted to me. But, if they are not to be mine, I cheerfully forego them."

"Well, from my heart I wish you success. I hope I may greet you one day as Lord Charnleigh, of Crown Leighton. Jesting apart, they will not find one more worthy of the name."

"Thank you," said Captain Flemyng, gravely; "a noble name should make a noble man."

A JAPANESE POSTOFFICE.

How the Mail Is Handled in the Land of the Mikado.

The interior of a Japanese postoffice is interesting not only from the lack of mechanical appliances, but also from the great number of hands employed, as is customary in Eastern countries where labor is so cheap. First there is the posting office, with the curious sallow little faces crowded into the 12x12 window space. Next comes the stamping room, each table surrounded by busy workers who look like women with their pinned-up queues, and full nether garments. The letters are slowly and methodically stamped, one at a time, with a big modern stencil, much like a miniature churn-dasher, and then consigned to a chute running from the table into baskets on the floor. The baskets are taken up when full by boys and taken to the inspection room and thence to the distribution room. Here before long tiers of shelves above great tables, the clerks are busy as bees and silent as the grave; they are not allowed to talk—blessed precaution against blunders.

The foreign and domestic mails are then divided, and the next step is the assorting and the registry rooms, where the mail is done up in small brown bags. In the mailing room the clerks wear full European dress. At the door is the foreign mail cart, a dray consisting of floor and high sides and ends of bright red slats. In this the bags are laid carefully, and a coolie starts in at a trot and lands it at the dock, where it is transferred, by an important, uniformed Jap, to the mail steamer.

But the home collecting and delivery service is far more picturesque. The collector uses a hand cart and two boys. At regular intervals on the road are boxes similar to American patrol boxes, but only about a tenth as large. The mail has been shot into them from the openings on each side of the gable roof, and the collector has to unlock a little door near the ground and extract the mail from below.

Disastrous Tornadoes.

The first tornado recorded in America dates back to the May of 1761. South Carolina was the district then afflicted. In 1840 a tornado struck Natchez, Miss., tearing houses into fragments, killing 317 people, carrying some of them long distances through the air, seriously injuring 109 others, sinking between sixty and seventy vessels, flooding the city to the depth of a foot, and passing off within four minutes from the instant that it made its first appearance.

In 1842 another tornado visited Natchez with even more disastrous results, leaving behind it upon this occasion between four and five hundred dead.

For nearly forty years there was a cessation of these visitations, namely, until April 18, 1880, when Marshfield, in Ozark Township, the capital of Webster County, Mo., was totally destroyed by a cyclone that struck it and left it in five minutes. At that time Marshfield had a population of 655 only, but it was an enterprising town, with an unusually large number of houses for its population. After the cyclone had passed, 100 of its population had been killed, and of the remaining 555 every individual was seriously injured.

Previous to the experience of a week ago, the most destructive tornado the United States has experienced was probably that which struck Louisville, Ky., and the neighboring States on the afternoon of March 27, 1890.

The tornado, accompanied by a terrific rain, entered the city of Louisville at one side, passed through, leaving it at the opposite side, and in its wake two square miles of prostrate buildings, one hundred dead, and a vast amount of suffering.

Europe's Twenty Million Soldiers.

It is estimated by MajorGeneral Tarrell that whereas at the time of the Crimean war, the last European struggle in which this country was engaged, the aggregate strength of the armies of the great powers of Europe did not exceed 3,000,000 in round numbers, today it is more than 20,000,000.

Without including the final reserves and only reckoning those men who have been thoroughly trained as soldiers and are liable for service beyond the frontiers, Russia has in round numbers 5,000,000, of men, France and Germany 4,000,000, Austria 2,500,000, and Italy 2,000,000. And these numbers are being continually increased. Lately France, by lengthening the duration of liability to service from a period of twenty to twenty-five years, made an enormous addition to her military strength, and the present German army bill contemplates a large increase in the numbers of the German army.—London News.

THE Lafayette Natural-gas Company has closed a deal with the Diamond Plate-glass Company whereby the latter turns over to the home corporation between five and six thousand acres of leased land in the gas belt. The tract is not far from Windfall. The strip secured is two miles wide and something over ten miles in length, and is said to be in the heart of the gas field. The Lafayette company now has somewhere in the neighborhood of sixteen thousand acres under lease and plenty of gas is assured.

MRS. THOMAS MOORE, a colored woman of Columbus, has been sick for the last six months, and has sought relief of many physicians. Recently she applied to a Columbus physician for relief, and was given some medicine that eased her. The other evening she again became desperately sick and began vomiting. Something alive arose in her throat and came out of her mouth. She seized hold of it and pulled hard, breaking it in two, but secured twelve inches of the varmint. She was horrified at seeing it squirm like a snake on the floor, where it was thrown. The beast or serpent was killed and brought to the family physician who as yet has been unable to name it. Other physicians are making a pathological survey of the new animal.

WHILE Louise, the 5-year-old daughter of John Ruppee of Lafayette, was playing in the kitchen alone, her clothing caught fire from the stove and she was burned so badly she died.

ANOTHER incendiary fire occurred at Newport, recently. The torch was applied in the rear of R. E. Stephens' store building on the north side, and it was totally destroyed. Robert Newlin occupied the building as a restaurant. Loss on building about $800, and on stock $75, both insured in the Home of New York. This makes the sixth incendiary fire around the public square in the last three years.

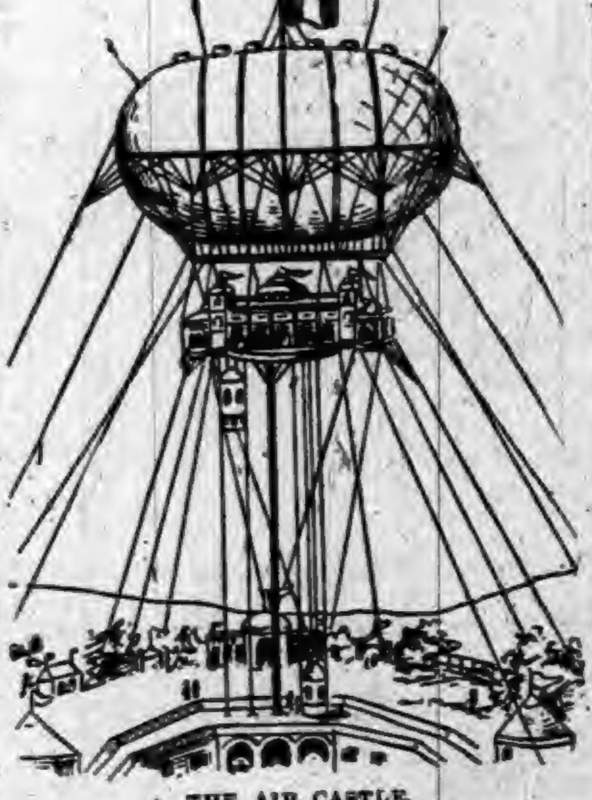
MRS. G. B. SEAVERS, an old resident of Kokomo, met death in a singular manner. In cleaning rubbish from a woodshed she picked up an old boot, from which fell a rusty revolver. The weapon, in striking the floor, was discharged, sending a bullet through her brain. She was 60 years old.

MRS. ANNA M. WILSON has brought suit against three of Danville's prominent druggists for selling intoxicating drinks to her husband. She asks for damages in the sum of $6,000 in two cases.

AN AIR CASTLE.

To Be Supported by a Balloon Over the Berlin Exposition Grounds.

The Eiffel Tower and the Ferris Wheel, the two nineteenth century exposition wonders, are to be thrown into the shade by a veritable air castle, of which Civil Engineer Tobyanski has furnished the plans, which will be used at the Berlin Exposition. As will be seen from the accompanying illustration, a captive balloon is used for carrying a castle-like structure, suspended in mid air.



THE AIR CASTLE.

Aluminum and bamboo rods are to be principally used in the construction of it. It is to be reached by an elevator. Together with the immense captive balloon, which itself measures 74,079 cubic meters, with an area of 9,311 square meters, the castle, elevator, and 150 persons will weigh 130,827 pounds. The balloon, according to the force of the wind, will support the castle at an altitude varying between 600 and 1,500 feet above the ground. Inside of thirty minutes it can be let down. The castle itself is 90 feet long and has an area of 600 square feet. Nothing is left undone to guarantee the greatest safety and every possible precautionary measure is taken to make a visit to the castle an absolutely safe thing.

THE COYOTE.

The Lean, Hungry, Keen-Scented Scavenger of the Plains.

The coyote, now fast disappearing before civilization, was formerly the scavenger of the Western plains, and still flourishes in the vicinity of small settlements. Its cry is one of the most dismal, and, heard in the darkness and solitude of the night, is well calculated to strike a chill into the breast of man. Now the plaint ceases, but in an instant it breaks forth with renewed vigor, yelping, howling, crying, strangling, and dying away like the wail of a lost soul sinking into hades.

Wherever easy prey, dead or alive, is to be obtained, there the coyote will be found. In the days when herds of buffalo existed, the sneaking coyote prowled at their heels in great numbers, eagerly watching for a wounded or dying animal. In strong bands they would fall upon the unfortunate creature which lagged in the rear and tear its quivering flesh before life had fully departed. Untiring, lean, gorging to repletion when the opportunity offers and again starving to the verge of death, these scavengers of the plains may become dangerous when driven to extremities by famine or rendered unusually courageous by large numbers. Ordinarily the coyote is shy and has a wholesome fear of man. It is only upon rare occasions that the lone traveler is attacked. The scent of the coyote is remarkably keen, and the animals travel very rapidly to any place where they expect a feast.

THE WHITE HOUSE DOCTOR.

The Physician to Whom the President's Health Is Intrusted.

Dr. Joseph D. Bryant, to whom the health of the President is intrusted, was a member of the Board of Health of New York City for six years, a position which he resigned last March. While a health commissioner he did much to improve the sanitary condition of New York. Dr. Bryant and Secretary Dan Lamont married sisters, and it was through the Secretary of War that Dr. Bryant became intimate with the President, whose family physician he now is. During the summer he and President Cleveland went on many fishing expeditions together.

MALIETOA'S supremacy in Samoa is now completely established, and his ancient rival and enemy, Mataafa, is not only dethroned, but is to be deported to the Marshall archipelago. The cruel thing about his expatriation is the fact that his wives will not be allowed to accompany him. Mataafa had built up a flourishing laundry business in Apia. His wives did the washing and he collected the bills. By this action of the foreign powers he is therefore deprived of both realm and revenue at one fell swoop.

BOSTON ONE-PRICE CLOTHING STORE,
Auburn.

Another Concord Robbery.

Another bold robbery occurred at Concord on Wednesday evening of last week, the particulars of which are as follows: On the evening mentioned, Henry Baker closed his store at about half past eight o'clock, and Christ. Keller went from there over to Richard Ervin's store, bought a box of sardines, eat them and left the corners for home. As everyone else had left the store before Keller came in, Ervin was left alone, and as soon as Keller was gone, he saw a stranger going north past the store walking very fast. Wondering who he was and what was his business, Mr. Ervin went out on the store porch and saw him turn east on the platform at the railroad. Supposing it to be someone going down the railroad track, he re-entered the store, blew out one light, took his change, which was in a shot poke, and was just ready to blow the last light when a man entered the store and called for a cigar and a plug of tobacco. Ervin set the change poke under the counter, and while getting the tobacco, the fellow inquired how far it was to Auburn, and talked as calmly as could be. He then threw down a dollar to pay for his tobacco and Ervin lifted his change poke to the edge of the counter to get the change, when the fellow grabbed the poke with his left hand and drew a revolver from his breast pocket with his right. He held the revelver in Ervin's face, but Ervin held onto the money poke. A tussel followed in which they nearly pushed a large show case from the counter and Ervin got a badly bruised knuckle. The robber held the advantage, as he had hold of the sack just above the money, and at last succeeded in wrenching it out of Ervin's hand and ran out. Ervin followed and on reaching the porch, saw two men running towards the railroad He followed to the railroad and then came back, ran to Baker's, called to Baker to get up and bring his gun; but by the time they were aroused, the robbers had reached their buggy, which was standing half way to G. W. Draggoo's, put the whip to their horses and were out of sight. Mr. Keller had passed the buggy standing there as he went home and suspicioned that all was not right, but raised no alarm. They were driving a team of small bay horses, one having a strip in the face. The man who did the robbing was of medium height, with a small black moustache and wore dark clothes. The poke contained somewhere between $15 and $25, Mr. Ervin supposed, but did not know just how much. It also contained one of the store keys, which made it necessary to change the locks. These are the facts in brief and there is nothing to add, except there is no clew to the thieves.

Court.

When we went to press last week, the court was working on the damage case Wm. Likens had brought against the Lake Shore road for breaking his arm when the fast train jumped the track in Butler. The trial was finished Thursday and given to the jury that evening. They wrestled with it all night, and next morning brought in a verdict in favor of the railroad. We understand this result was due to the peculiar character of the accident. The man who threw the mail sack that got under the wheels and threw the car off, was not in the employ of the road, but of the U. S. government. The man lost his arm all right, but it appeared that the railroad did not do it.

Monday, the case of Henry M. Stone against the Grand Rapids railroad came up on a change of venue from Ft. Wayne. It appears that Stone was an engineer on that road, and that when he went to take water at Grand Rapids, the pipe which is connected with the city pipes burst open and a piece of it was hurled toward Stone, striking him in the breast and injuring him so he cannot work. He asks damages. His attorneys are Penfield, of Auburn, Ninde of Ft. Wayne, and Marshall, of Columbia City. The attorneys for the road are Judge McClellan, of Auburn, and Judge Zollars, of Ft. Wayne. On assembling here, the attorneys talked over the matter, and as Mr. Ninde's daughter was sick, the trial was postponed for the present. It will come off next term. There are many witnesses and the trial is likely to last several days

Chris. Curie has been made guardian of Mrs. Catherine Hettinger. In the Barth ditch case, plaintiff has sixty days in which to file exceptions. The case of Stone vs. the G. R. & I. Ry. is set for the second Tuesday in next term. The case of the Auburn F. & M. Works vs DeKalb County goes to Steuben county. Cora Leonard was divorced from John H. and given $300. The scandal cases at Butler are settled, for which we are thankful. The defendant, Miller, pays costs, but we have not heard as to any more. Boots also withdraws the divorce suit against his wife. Wm. A. Douglass, of Clear Lake, was admitted to the bar on motion of W. H. Leas. To-day, Thursday, begins the case against young Widney for taking the railroad mileage books at Butler.

A Pioneer Yachtman.

From Harper's Weekly.

It was in 1801 that Captain George Crowninshield, of Salem, Massachusetts, placed an order for a sloop yacht of about twenty-two tons with his fellow-townsman, Christopher Turner, a famous shipwright of that day. She was named the Jefferson, after the newly elected president, and forthwith entered upon a career of pleasure cruising, with no rivals in her class. So far as known she was the first American boat of sea-going dimensions designed and built specially for yachting purposes. Salem was then at the zenith of her maritime prosperity, and the Crowninshields were among her most prosperous and daring sea-captains and ship owners.

The peaceful voyages along the picturesque north shore came to an abrupt end in 1812, when Captain George promptly accepted England's challenge for a series of international races on the high seas. He shipped a crew of twenty men, gave the Jefferson as big a gun as she could safely carry, and sent her out as a privateer. Within a few days she won an exciting race with the British schooner Nymph, and putting a prize crew on board, sent her home to Salem. Two other captures were the additional rewards of this voyage. Thus early did the one existing Yankee yacht establish a creditable reputation for speed end efficiency.

It is perhaps worth noting that this pioneer yachtman was the owner of an America that long antedated the renowned schooner of the same name, and won a series of races, in comparison with which the excitement of a cup contest fades into insignificance. This original America made four voyages as a privateer, capturing certainly twenty-six, and probably between thirty and forty British vessels. The total value of her prizes considerably exceeded one million dollars. She was one of the fleetest vessels of her day, and could easily run away from anything that was to big to fight. That was a kind of sailing race to stir a yachtman's heart. No preliminary correspondence, no deeds of gift, the leading boat on her best point of sailing regardless of time allowance, and the prospect of a fight at close quarters for a finish!

The Jefferson was sold in 1815 and turned into a fishing smack, in which capacity she served for many years in the waters about Nahant and Marblehead. Indeed, it is not beyond the range of possibility that she may be still afloat.

He next built "Cleopatra's Barge," which was launched in December, 1816. This yacht was rigged as a brigantine, and cost about $50,000 even at that early day. She measured 83 feet on the water line, was 22 feet, 11½ inches wide, and 11 feet, 5½ inches deep. Curiously enough, these dimensions and proportions are not very different from those of the cup-defender, Mayflower, and her successors. Her tonnage was 191½ tons, nearly—almost exactly that of the Mayflower, under the old rules of measurement

In spite of her owner's love for seamanship, his taste in the matter of decoration seems to have been, to say the least, eccentric—one side of the yacht was painted in horizontal stripes of many colors, and the other bore a similarly diversified device after the manner of the herring-bone pattern. Her stand rigging was made of ropes laid in different colored strands, huge false windows were painted on the sides of her cabin, and altogether she must have been distinctly at variance with what is considered "shipshape" at the present day. Nevertheless she was very fast, and beat the sailing frigate United States, a crack ship of her day, in an all-day race at sea.

Now is the Time to Plant.

CHICAGO'S MAYOR KILLED.

The Mayor of Chicago was assassinated Saturday evening by a crank who thought he ought to be appointed city counsel, though we believe he was not a lawyer. There is a full account of the terrible crime on our second page inside.

Repeal Bill Passed.

Voorhees' repeal bill not only repeals the purchase clause of the Sherman law, but adds that it shall be the po'icy of this country to provide for the coinage and actual use as money, of both gold and silver, and to provide such conditions as shall secure their parity in circulation as money. One would think that silver men ought to be satisfied with this. We have said all along that there was no intention to make laws against the use of silver as money. This bill passed the Senate Monday by 43 to 32, the old parties being that evenly divided on it. It now goes to the House in its amended form, and will no doubt be passed there this week and be signed by the president. The repeal was the proper thing to do, but whether it will do as much good or harm as some claim for it, remains to be seen.

FATHER SORIN, founder of Notre Dame school at South Bend died Tuesday.

ELECTION in Ohio and several other states next Tuesday. It looks to us here, as though Ohio would go republican.

GERMANY is now objecting to the use of American hay which is being sold there in considerable quantities, They say it is not as nutritious as their own hay, and that besides it has bugs. This will be news over here.

PAID admissions to the fair Tuesday, the next day after it had closed, were over 48,000. It closed formally on Monday, when cannons were fired at sunset and all flags run down. There was no ceremony or fireworks, for the mayor, who was to have made a speech, had been assassinated Saturday evening. We think admittance will be allowed for some time yet

SUGAR manufacturors and raisers are asking congress to give them help. They want the bounty of two cents a pound continued. Now what are the wheat men, the corn men, the oats men, the potato men, the apple men, the peach men and other farmers doing about their interests? If it is right to give one class a bounty, it is right to give to all. Let's have fair play. Give everybody a bounty or give none.

OPENING the markets of the world to American products, will make prices better. See how soon pork went down, when a few years ago Germany refused to buy of us, and how soon it rose in price when they concluded to buy again. Then see how hay came up, when foreign nations began to buy of us. Give us the nations of the earth to sell to and we can produce more and get better prices. But a protective tariff keeps foreign nations opposed to buying of us because we won't buy of them.

REPUBLICAN papers seem to be greatly distressed because the democrats in congress are trying to force the minority to transact a little business. They say democrats objected to being forced to work when Reed was speaker. But they evidently do not understand the difference in the conditions. Reed counted men present who were not in the city, and who were not needed to make a quorum, if republican members had attended. Democratic speaker now insists on counting the republican members who are really present. But he goes one better, and forces democratic members to attend, as there are enough of them alone to make a quorum, just as there were of Republicans in Reed's Congress.

An Income Tax Bill.

Representative de Armond's scheme for raising government revenues has some features slightly unusual. Mr. de Armond wants to accumulate annual revenues large enough to meet the outlay for pensions, be the same great or small. For this purpose he would impose a graded tax on all incomes beyond $10,000. The secretary of the treasury shall fix the annual rate of the income tax and proportion it to the amount needed to pay the pensions. The $10,000 income is to be taken as a basis and is to be taxed a certain percent. All incomes up to $50,000 shall be taxed at the same rate. For incomes between $50,000 and $100,000 the rates shall be doubled. Incomes between $100,000 and $200,000 shall be levied on at a rate three times as great as that of the $10,000 income. A man with $1,000,000 a year will pay a rate six times as great as the person worth $10,000 a year. This measure will probably be favored by all persons with an income of less than $10,000 a year, and pronounced robbery by those who have that and more. If such a law should be passed, the poor millionaires will have as desperate a struggle to evade it as they now have to get out of paying real estate taxes.

The L. L. C. Entertain.

One of the pleasantest gatherings that has taken place in Auburn for some time was the luncheon given by the Ladies' Literary Club at the home of Mrs. M. B. Willis in honor of Mrs. Lottie Ford Cochran, an honorary member of the club residing at Ontario, California. Mrs Cochran has been here since May, spending the summer with her father, Dr. Ford. She has been a member of the L L. C. since the early part of its organization.

The luncheon which was given last Thursday at noon was, as are all entertainments given by this excellent club, a perfect success. Although the day outside was rainy and dreary, inside all was bright and beautiful. The tables with their shaded lights, their china and flowers, made a scene that was delightful to behold. Each table had its distinctive decoration. There was a yellow table, at which the guest of honor was seated, as a compliment to her adopted state, and state flower, the yellow California poppy; a white table, at which the attendants were dressed in white and all the decorations were of the same pure color; an outumn table, where the decorations were of the beautiful leaves; a pansy table, where the favors were bright-faced pansies, which seemed to look you in the face and smile a welcome; a pink table, where the dainty pink geraniums formed a pleasing contrast to the pure white table linen and dainty china. At the place of each guest was a pretty souvenir, a dainty menu card, at the top of which was this appropriate sentiment from Shakespeare: "A good digestion to you all: and, once more, we shower a welcome on you; Welcome all."

Of the menu itself, consisting of seven courses, words fail to describe its excellence. The ease and daintiness, with which it was served and the excellence of the viands themselves can only be appreciated by those who were fortunate enough to be guests.

The club colors, yellow and green, were noticeable in the decorations. Between fifty and sixty were present, and when it is known that only one guest was allowed each member, those who were invited may well consider themselves as fortunate.

The club was pleased to have with them, two other of their honorary members, Mrs. Helen Ensley, of Indianapolis, and Dr. Lida Leasure, of Angola. They were cordially welcomed by those present. The guests from out of town were, Mrs. Dr. Spooner, of Peru; Mrs. Fetters, of Kendallville, and Miss Ward, of Colorado Springs, Col.

Respect the Dead.

During the past week, J. A. Sawyer, assisted by his father, Isaac Sawyer, of Wilmington township, disinterred the remains of his grandfather, grandmother and a sister that were buried in one of the first burying grounds in Wilmington, township, being on the old Lee Armstrong farm, and was once known as the Means burying ground. It had fallen into neglect and dilapidation and hence the removal. The sister has been buried since 1857, thirty-six years, the grandfather twenty-nine years, and the grandmother sixteen years. The remains were interred in Woodlawn cemetery by J. F. Aber and J. A. Sawyer, on a beautiful and spacious lot they had bought, and where J. A. Sawyer's son was recently buried. The size of the lot is such that there will be four generations buried on the same lot. It would naturally be expected that the oldest of the four generations would be laid to rest first in this new lot. Not so. The youngest was laid there first. J. A. Sawyer's little boy was the first one, being placed at what is considered the last end of the lot. "The first shall be last, and the last first." How often are these words recalled! The grandfather, Asa Sawyer was born in 1796 in Vermont, removed from there to Ohio and from Ohio to Wilmington township in 1842, and resided there until his death in 1864. He will be remembered by many of the oldest settlers, he being one of the physicians of this county in the 40's and 50's. His son Isaac, still lives on the same farm that his father settled on in 1842, having lived there for fifty-one years.

WHY CHINESE NEVER SAVE LIFE.

They Regard It as Interfering with the Intention of the Creator.

Much has been written of the peculiarities and eccentricities of the Chinese, but it is not generally known that the people of the Celestial empire will not rescue one another from accidental death.

At a fire in San Francisco several years ago six Chinese were imprisoned in a room by three half inch iron bars, which could easily have been broken away. There were two or three ladders in the neighborhood which could have been placed at the windows and the unfortunates easily rescued from a horrible death. There were hundreds of their countrymen looking on at their frantic efforts to escape. Yet they offered no assistance and gave no evidence of sorrow.

A man who has saved many lives, in speaking with a Chinese once said they were very heartless and cited this San Francisco fire as an example, whereupon the Celestial exclaimed:

"I tell you. You sabee Joss! Gol Almighty, alle samee. Chinaman call him Joss; Melican call him God. Call him anything. Alle samee. Now you say Gol Almighty make ebleting?"

"Yes, everything."

"Make alle men?"

"Yes."

"Know ebleting?"

"Yes."

"Now, do you think you know more than Gol Almighty?"

"No, I do not."

"He makee allee men. He see one man. He think him no good. He say, 'You no use; go die.' You think you know bette Gol Almighty. You go swim; you no let man die. Gol Almighty he say: 'He velly smart. He catchee man I tell go die. Velly well, that man begin new. He cally that man's life all him sins, all him troubles, all him bad luck. You hab heap good things?'"

"No."

"No hab much houses, much money, much land?"

"No; not much."

"All light, you nebbe hab much luck. How many you save?"

"About fifty."

"Oh, you nebber get out. You cally all fifty life. Ebleting you do, no finish, work allee time heap trouble. You nebbe get old; you live long time. Sabee fifty life. You live hundled years—had bad luck allee time. Gol Almighty he sabee best."—Fire and Water.

Catching Boas.

"To catch a boa constrictor is a difficult and dangerous task," says a man who makes it his business to capture wild animals and reptiles for menagerie purposes. "It is accomplished by a labyrinthian tangle, embracing sixty square feet of ground. The labyrinth is made by joining together, end on end, pieces of matting. This web is eight feet high usually, and placed so that the opposing walls will be two feet apart. All sorts of crisscross and diverging combinations are made with the matting—it is supported here and there by stakes—making, when it is set, a geometrical puzzle that might well challenge the ingenuity of man.

"The trap is baited with a live pig, which is placed in a pen in the corner of the labyrinth. By and by along comes the boa constrictor. It is easy enough to get in. He scents the prey; he is very hungry; the pig is devoured, and here the boa comes to grief. For hours he tries to release himself, but finally he grows tired and stretches himself out for a nap. Then is our time. We open the labyrinth and catch him."—Golden Days.

Where Vessels Capsize Frequently.

The capsizing of a vessel tied up to a pier is common enough in the Bay of Fundy and its tributary streams. The usual rise and fall of the tide along that bay is from forty to fifty feet, and high tides sometimes exceed sixty feet. With the fall of the tide all craft are left high, but by no means dry, with an area of chocolate colored mud all about them. This mud is too shifting to hold a vessel in safety, so each pier is provided with one or more strong wood frames called shoes, fixed at the bottom of the stream or bay.

Upon these shoes all vessels rest at low tide. It frequently happens, however, that a vessel does not get her shoe snugly on, so to speak, and if a strong wind comes when she is thus ill balanced, over she goes into the mud, to be buried forty feet under the next rising tide.—New York Sun.

A Painful Operation.

A farmer shaving is one of the most painful sights ever witnessed outside downright butchery. For some reason beyond the present depth of knowledge the man who "beards" in the country always has a beard like a new hair-brush, and he can never learn how to sharpen a razor. He gets on the back porch with his shaving utensils, and after rubbing the razor over the strop in an awkward fashion until whatever trace of edge it may have had has been destroyed he hangs up his broken glass, and takes a position alongside the kitchen door, where the old lady will be sure to jostle his arm when she goes out to empty her dishwater.

With a brush that has but little handle remaining he manages to stir up a lot of lather from soap that would raise a blister on the bottom of a boy's foot, and with this he coats his face till nothing but his eyes and the back of his head are visible. With his thumb dipped in warm water he goes over the stubble again with a vigor that makes his flesh creep, until he feels that all reasonable precautions for comfort in the subsequent operations have been taken.

Taking the razor and looking at it suspiciously over the top of his glasses, he runs his thumb along the edge, fails to draw blood as he had hoped, and then with a sigh grabs himself by the nose, shuts his eyes and gives a scrape that makes his hair stand on end, as a bunch of bristles seems to come out by the roots.

But, once at it, a terrible desperation seems to nerve him, and, with his teeth set, he goes right on with a determination to get the agony over as soon as possible.

Howls of woe break from him now and then as an expression that poisons life steals over his face and stops there till the last nerve has been pulled out of the socket by that terrible razor and the last bit of stubble has been laid low.

Then, and only then, with a sigh of relief, he strikes up a hymn of thanksgiving and joyfully throws his shaving paper into the ash pit near by.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Benefits of Bicycle Riding.

Exercise on the wheel is better than walking, because the weight of the body is principally supported by the saddle. Strength is economized and the exertion of force distributed more generally throughout the muscles of the legs, arms and body, and equal results in progress reached by far less exertion, or proportionately greater results by the same exertion. In other words, the wheelman rides ten miles in an hour with less fatigue than he would walk four in the same time, because in walking almost all the muscular exertion is thrown on the legs.

Few people breathe properly. They use only the upper portion of the lungs and leave a large residuum of impure air. Bicycle riding causes thorough respiration and tones up the general circulation. It is particularly beneficial to men and women of sedentary habits, and gives them such exhilarating pleasure that they do not feel the labor involved.—New York Ledger.

A Small Piece of Justice.

In a small town not many miles from Erie, Pa., there was a case before the justice of the peace that was settled very summarily.

It appears that a Mr. Jones had beaten Mr. Brown's dog with a club for chasing his chickens. They met at the office of the justice, each accompanied by a lawyer, and bound to see the thing through, no matter what it cost. As Jones and Brown were prominent citizens of the town a large crowd assembled at the trial, expecting to hear some great oratory from the lawyers.

The justice was a very pompous and ignorant old fellow, who was great on big words, no matter whether appropriate or not. The case was called, the witnesses who had seen the clubbing gave their testimony, and Jones' lawyer arose to open for his client, when the justice said:

"Hold on, Mr. Lawyer, there is no use argifying or condisputing about this matter, as there is no case of assessity for it. Mr. Jones was highly unwrong in beating Mr. Brown's dog, so I fine him ten dollars for cruelty to dumb animals, and that is all there is about it."—Detroit Free Press.

How Women Increase Care.

Oh, woman, if you will have carpets someone must propel the sweeper; if you must have stuffy curtains and hangings someone must fight the invading moth: if you will make your house an art gallery, a museum of modern curios, a furniture warehouse, a China emporium, a toy shop and a World's fair in miniature—why, you do make it a dimple of loveliness, but know this, my daughter, and hear it for thy good, she that increaseth bric a-brac increaseth care, and much bijouterie is a weariness of the flesh, writes J. Burdette in his own inimitable way, on "The Taskmistress of Women," in the November Ladies' Home Journal. But all this is your own doing. Wherefore, do not come around the den of man, wailing that woman's work is never done; that you are tired to death, and that you have no time to read or improve yourself. Go to your mirror and make faces at the responsible party. Of course, the monster enjoys all these things—the exquisite taste and the art and loveliness in his house. He enjoys the toothsome breakfast and the dainty china, the elaborate luncheon and the great dinner. But he doesn't really need so much, and I doubt very much if it is good for him; he is always apt to get more than is good for him.

Parties in Concord township have found various articles in the woods, that it is believed were dropped by the thieves that broke into Baker's store at Concord not long ago. It is also the prevailing opinion that the man Mr. Baker shot, has since died.

The World's fair is over. It was a grand thing—nothing like it ever seen on earth. It was a great object lesson, but it cost the people a vast sum of money. Now let us settle down to business, save up our dimes, pay our little debts, and so grease the wheels of business, that things will begin to move on again as usual.

There are still several hundreds of our subscribers who have allowed their subscriptions to get two or three, or more years behind, and we have waited on them patiently since the hard times began a year ago last May. Now we think each ought to make an extra effort to square up. Waiting on so many has been a serious drawback to us, and now let us take a business view of it and get even or partly even.

Last week we made a note of a beautiful chrysalis brought to our office by Chris. Fell. It was of course fixed up to last over winter and to come out with wings in the warm days of next spring. But Tom Sommers made up his mind to try an experiment with it and put it into a warm room, and by next day it had burst its shell and there it was, a beautiful butterfly, one of the most brilliant ever seen and none the worst for its early hatching.

The Hudson World boasts that every editor in that county is a temperance man. We congratulate them. The profession should be, and generally is, made up of men, not only temperate, but of high character. Over in this county this condition is the prevailing one, with one exception. It is needless to say who constitutes that disgraceful exception. It is a matter of public notoriety, and has been for many years. It is a pretty hard burden for the fraternity to bear.

D. Y. Husselman has accepted a position traveling agent for the Moline Plow Co, of Moline, Ill., and will enter at once on his new field of operations. Mr. Husselman is a man eminently calculated to make this line of work a success, his general knowledge of business, and a special knowledge of foundry work, would seem to be particularly in his favor. Besides these especial qualifications, his service as county clerk for four years will not be lost on him in his new field, and being a man of more than ordinary pleasant address and manners, will add greatly to his success and to his value to the great manufacturing house with whose interests he is now identified. Everybody knows the Moline Plow Company and their excellent plows. Everybody who was at the great Chicago fair will remember the grand exhibit they had in Agricultural Machinery Hall, especially the big Dutchman with the lights, and the big revolving copper globe. And then there was such a fine display of lovely plows, and things in their line. It is a great manufacturing house, and we believe they have done a handsome business turn for themselves in securing Mr. Husselman for this branch of their field work.

Wilber, Neb., Republican:—The numerous friends of Rev. Dieffenbach will be pleased to learn that he will remain as pastor of the Lutheran church for another year. He received some tempting calls from places east, but has concluded to remain with us. Among the inducements offered by the council of his church here, was an increase of salary from $600 to $800.

A new postoffice has been located north of Summit, where the new Wabash and the Lake Shore cross. The crossing has long been known as "Steubenville," or "Yuba Dam." We don't know which name it will take, and don't care, so they make arrangements to change the mails there so the COURIER can reach its readers at Ashley, Hudson and Helmer the same day it leaves the office. That is all we ask, and the people up there ask it also.

Miss Myra Seydel and Mrs. Lizzie Kelley drove up to Ashley Monday and had a pleasant visit with the family of Sam Seydel, Miss Seydel's brother. Sam is doing well there, as he deserves to. He has a good business and owns his building. They found the town somewhat excited over another fire. This time it was the large livery barn of A. D. Yoder, one of the largest in this part of the country. A blacksmith shop near by was also destroyed before the fire could be got under control.

L. E. Lane writes from his new home in Michigan to the Dispatch, with a pen dipped in taffy. He says the Dispatch is the only paper that works for home business, etc., etc. We suppose this to be a fling at the COURIER. If so, Mr. Lane should not forget that the editor of the COURIER patronized him from first to last, while more than half the other people here sent their work abroad. Week in and week out, our only available collar went to Lane's laundry for purification and sanitation, till the curtain fell on his business career in Auburn. Yet he seemed to have not only overlooked this, but with it a little bill due the COURIER. "It was ever thus," etc, for nearly every man that ever went back on this great family newspaper, did so owing us various sums of money.

Mr. W. M. Terry, who has been in the drug business at Elkton, Ky., for the past twelve years, says: "Chamberlain's Cough Remedy gives better satisfaction than any other cough medicine I have ever sold." Worthington's Magazine for November fully sustains the reputation gained by previous numbers. In the competition for popular favor this magazine holds a leading place, being bright, fresh and enjoyable in every detail of its make-up. Its flavor is distinctly American, and the leading articles are always upon subjects upon which American readers—men, women and children—should be thoroughly posted. Nothing could be more instructive, while thoroughly enjoyable, than the leading articles which the discerning editor gathers from a wealth of valuable contributions and presents with the added charm and interest of numerous illustrations. Nothing better, cleaner, more wholesome and helpful in tone for the general reading of the American family from our eastern to our far western coast, could have been devised than this brilliant young monthly, which is so rapidly extending its inspiriting influence.

Not the Keeley Cure.

The Ohio Chemical Company which claimed to be a new "Gold Cure" for drunkenness and similar habits is now pronounced by the papers to be a failure or a fraud, we don't know which. At all events it appears they do not pay their advertising bills, etc. We warned our readers at the time, that there was but one real Keeley Cure, and that was started by Dr. Keeley himself at Dwight, Ill., and which has authorized branches in several states of the union. Two of these authorized branches are in Indiana, one being at Plainfield, near Indianapolis and the other in our own little city of Auburn. This is a real cure. The men in charge are responsible men, and their physicians, who treat the patients are skilled physicians and men of character, and ability. Unfortunate victims of the drink habit should be careful where they go for relief and not squander their money or waste time. The Auburn Keeley Institute offers them reliable and humane treatment and a perfect cure. They should come to Auburn, even if some other town offers a new and cheaper course of treatment. There is but one "Keeley Cure."

A WASHINGTON cashier stole $20,000, repented to the extent of expressing sorrow and retaining the booty, and got a sentence of three years in the penitentiary. YOUNG "Jack" Astor does not seem to be a complete success as a hardy mariner. Every time he takes the wheel of his $250,000 yacht Nourmahal the skippers of vessels in the vicinity weigh anchor and get out of the way with all the haste possible. He ran the vessel on a reef once, and a little later rammed a ferryboat and nearly sunk it. He explained that the first accident was "due to champagne." He must have "switched" to absinthe or plain whisky when he butted the ferryboat.

THE very cradle of civilization, so far as historical knowledge goes, pays a high compliment to American genius. A comprehensive system of street railways is to be constructed in Cairo, Egypt, and the Public Works Department of that city is advertising in New York for proposals. It would almost be enough to provoke a smile on the countenance of the Sphinx if the figure should happen to glance over at Cairo some morning and see a company of busy Yankees laying out street railway lines.

In a few years Chicago will be the largest and greatest city in the world and will extend eighty miles around the lake. New York? Well, it will remain a way station."

A BRITISH statistician who has been analyzing the causes of bankruptcy in England concludes that only two out of one hundred failures resulted from causes beyond the control of the bankrupts, or fraud or failure of others. The one chief cause of bankruptcy is found to be speculative trading, this including, of course, the attempt to carry on business with an excessive amount of borrowed capital. We wonder if a like analysis would show the same causes of bankruptcy in the United States.

BUNGSTARTER TILLMAN, of South Carolina, is going to get a trade mark for his whisky bottles after all. He asked the commissioner of patents to register the label put on all packages of liquors which the State sells, but the commissioner refused on the ground that a State could not engage in trade outside its own borders and therefore could not use a trade-mark. Tillman thereupon asked for a writ of mandamus ordering the patent office to register his label, and Judge Bradley, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, has granted it.

A man who wins money at cards simply fritters it away and acquires habits which unfit him for any legitimate occupation. I attribute the majority of suicides to gambling."

THE birthday of the Queen of Denmark was the occasion of what appears to American eyes a singular proceeding. The Danish court was in mourning for Prince William of Glucksburg. On the royal birthday the lord chamberlain announced that mourning was "suspended" for twenty-four hours. For one day, accordingly, all was joy and gayety at Fredensborg. The next morning befitting gloom once more descended upon the castle, and the royal inmates again began to mourn as hard as they could for poor old Bill, whose spirit must have been touched by this delicate attention.

AFTER spending many million pounds sterling in the construction of monster cannon and enormous war vessels, England is now told by a recipient of some of the millions that a great mistake has been made. Lord Armstrong, whose firm built the ill-fated Victoria, says "the arguments against building immense ironclads are unassailable." The same conclusion was reached by the British Admiralty some time ago, and no more unwieldy warships will be built for the British navy. It is fortunate that no such mistake was made in the construction of our new navy. We have no war vessels of the larger type, as compared with the navies of England, France, and Italy. They are of about the type that practical experience has discovered to be the best for effective service.

THERE is grave reason to fear that Germany's Grand Old Man is rapidly nearing the brink of his remarkable life. The worst is rarely told by the doctors in cases of famous patients, but enough appears to show that the great ex-Chancellar cannot long survive. The young Emperor evidently suspects that the end is near. With that shrewdness and cunning which have marked his brief reign in several instances, he now fairly gushes with love for Bismarck. Well he knows that Germany will appreciate the old man at his full value after he is gone. He knows, too, that his rude treatment of Bismarck, until a recent period, will stir the German breast. Hence his semblance of love now toward the man who was riveting the German Empire together at a time when Willie's military buttons were safety-pins.

A RECENT attempt at train-robbery in Missouri was baffled by the bandits being betrayed to the police. Among those who joined the gang for the purpose of "giving them away" was a newspaper reporter. This opens up new possibilities. The efforts of newspaper reporters to "disguise" themselves as tramps, beggars, book agents, bichloridians, lunatics, and so on, are familiar to the reading public. But these attempts, meritorious as they are in the city editor's eyes, serve no high and useful purpose. This latest effort, however, has a practical sound. It is not only worthy of imitation, but it gives the reporter a reason for existence. The most profound and optimistic students of sociology have hitherto been tempted to despair when contemplating the newspaper reporter. Now he can be classified somewhere between the stool pigeon and the detective.

LORD ARMSTRONG, the great English shipbuilder, who built the Victoria, enforced the lessons taught by the disaster to that vessel at the annual meeting of his concern. He contended that the arguments against building immense ironclads were unassailable. The same arguments, he said, held as good, however, against gigantic battleships. The strength and stability of the Camperdown's prow ram were quite insufficient to enable her to deliver an effective blow without peril to herself. The same defect probably existed in the other rams. The life of a battleship was far too valuable to be staked on the use of her ram. Besides, a big battleship was too unwieldy to give full effect to her ram. He advocated, therefore, the building of several vessels especially designed for ramming. The occasional loss of such an inexpensive vessel would be of small importance as compared with the loss of a great battleship like the Victoria. Undoubtedly Lord Armstrong voices the general conviction of naval experts in his comments upon the lamentable collision off Tripoli.

A Novel Test.

A simple but effective test to decide whether a man was drunk or sober was described by a medical man who gave evidence before the Pontefract bench. The colliers who were charged with drunkenness went to doctor ten minutes after they were seen by the police. The doctor made them walk up and down the surgery, which they did in a straight line, and then stood erect with their eyes closed and held their arms at length with extended fingers. The witness affirmed that the latter was a severe ordeal for persons under the influence of alcohol, and as the colliers passed through it without signs of shakiness the charge against them was dismissed.

JUGGLED STATISTICS.

MANUFACTURERS GET IN FINE WORK WITH FIGURES.

Those Favored by Protection Will Spend Millions to Prevent the Removal of the Duties—The Ohio Farmer and McKinley —The Income Tax.

How and Why 'Tis Done.

When it is sought to do away with unnatural obstructions to trade opposition is at once encountered from those interested in maintaining the obstructions. The manufacturers specially favored by protection dams, which turn water away from competitors' mills and into their own sluiceways, will spend millions to prevent the removal of the dams. Buying votes, bull-dozing employes, bribing legislators, coloring or falsifying statistics, and tricks, jobs and chicanery of all kinds are in order.

Observe for a moment the effects of protection upon statistics—official and unofficial. No one who has heard or read the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, given by manufacturers during the last decade, in regard to wages and labor cost, has any doubt as to the worthlessness of most of the statistics presented. If the "facts" presented are not absolutely false, it is only the highest wages in America that are compared with the lowest in England or Europe. Who doubts but that these same manufacturers, wherever possible, have juggled their returns to the Census Bureau? Who doubts that Census Taker Porter has often shut one eye and passed such patriotic imperfections by? Even his population statistics are worthless because of his inability to see and count "free-traders." Major Brock, of the Bureau of Statistics, neglected to make corrections amounting to more than $75,000,000 in the value of our imports, but no pains were spared to present the protection and reciprocity statistics in the most favorable light. Statistician Dodge, of the Agricultural Department, always fixed up his statistics to show what protection and reciprocity had done for the farmer. The tin-plate statistics of the Treasury and consular reports of the State Department were all edited with the one end in view and are notoriously crooked. All departments, both Federal and State, are expected to do their duty in this line. In this connection ex-Labor Commissioner Peck, of New York, is called to mind. He made figures to order for Republican manufacturers and burned the public papers that would disclose the particulars in regard to the inaccuracies. He is now under indictment for this offense, and is out on bail, awaiting his trial.

For the same reasons the statistics published in trade papers and reports are unreliable when they deal with protected industries. The public must be deceived or kept in ignorance of facts not favorable to protection. It is probable that steel rails are made as cheaply here as anywhere, but the manufacturers will not disclose the cost of production. An instance of the baneful effects upon statistics is supplied by the sugar industry. Willett & Gray's Sugar Trade Journal is the semi-official mouthpiece of the sugar trust, and is interested in making profits appear as small as possible until the Democrats decide what they will do with the ⅛ cent per pound duty on refined sugar. Recently a Baltimore man, to decide a bet, wrote to Willett & Gray to find out if refiners were making more than one cent or less than ¼ cent per pound on refined sugars. These supposed reliable authorities, after complaining about the "great injustice" done refiners by "absurd and misleading statements," proceeded to juggle with facts in a most reckless manner. They told the Baltimorean about "long prices," subject to discount, brokerage, cost of refining at ⅝ cent per pound, losses by "wear and tear" of machinery, taxes, interest, etc., until the inquirer might almost suppose the refiners were losing money every day. And yet in a special number issued in February, 1891, giving an "Analysis of the Sugar Refining Business for 1888-1889-1890," Messrs. Willett & Gray themselves estimated the cost of refining in 1888 and 1889 at ½ cent, and in 1890 at 9-16 cent per pound. They then deducted nothing for brokerage on refined or for impurity on raw sugar. They knew then, as they know now that the 9-16 cent cost of refining includes both of these items and also wear and tear, storage, taxes, interest, etc. But even the 9-16 cent is probably too much.

The Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin expresses the opinion that the cost of refining does not exceed ½ cent per pound. Instead of estimating net profits at considerably less than ¼ cent, as did Willett & Gray, the Bulletin concluded that they were fully 1 cent for Eastern and 2¼ cents per pound for Western refiners, and that profits were about twice as great as the average for the last year, when it estimated "an aggregate of $28,532,000 that is clean profit to the most arbitrary monopoly that the country ever saw or put up with."—Byron W. Holt.

The Ohio Farmer and McKinley.

There is not a farmer in the State of Ohio who does not feel that in some way his interests have been sacrificed. He sees immense wealth accumulated by the manufacturing industries. He sees that the respective plants have quadrupled in value. He recognizes that those engaged in those interests have lived each year at a cost twice, thrice greater than he has expended. He then realizes that his farm has depreciated in value. That it has declined twenty, thirty and in many instances fifty per cent. within the last three decades, and he asks himself, "Why is this so? Why does not the Government devise some legislation which will at least keep my property from depreciation. I have been promised a home market for my products, but I have discovered that my home market is ruled and regulated by the prices obtainable in the streets of Liverpool. Home market is a myth, if it is subject to the control of the Liverpool market. My farm has depreciated in value yearly, though it is more productive than it ever has been. I have made it so by the hardest of labor, yet it is still declining in value. I pay indirect taxes which enrich the manufacturer. His goods are not controlled by a foreign market. The tariff enables him to have a home market, and he sells at a large profit. But I must part with my products at a price fixed in Liverpool. I can't see the justice of legislation which enforces a tribute from me for others, and leaves me naked to contend with the cheap labor of foreign countries." That is a sensible argument and a sensible conclusion, but the farmer will continue to suffer—his lands will continue to depreciate until the protective tariff is repealed.

The McKinley and kindred legislations are responsible for the present depressed conditions. The Republicans have enacted all the laws for more than thirty years. These laws tax the multitude to the benefit of the manufacturing interests. They have taken hundreds of millions of dollars from the laborer, the mechanic, the farmer, and they will continue to take millions more if they are not replaced with wholesmoe laws which tax only for the support of the government.—Pomeroy (Ohio) Democrat.

A Just Income Tax.

Why is it that the average legislator appears to be determined to make the poorer classes pay in proportion to their ability higher taxes than the rich? One can understand why it should be so in a Government where great power is lodged in a privileged aristocracy. But why is it so in a republic?

It is a notorious feature of the McKinley law that the highest percentage of extortion is laid upon those kinds and qualities of goods which are the necessities or the commonest comforts of the masses of the people. The luxuries of the rich are taxed lightly in comparison. This is one of the outrageous wrongs of that iniquitous statute.

No sooner is an income tax proposed than forthwith schemers are prolific of projects for such an income tax as will cause certain hardship to the great body of persons of small incomes, wage-earners, salaried men and small traders, but may be borne by capitalists easily or with comparative ease.

The purpose of such schemes appears to be to make an income tax unpopular, and so to defeat it in the interest of plutocrats who now contrive to escape all taxation on a large share of their invested wealth. These are the persons whom an income tax ought to catch and compel to do their proper duty towards the Government that protects them

Incomes under $5,000 ought to be exempt from tax or subject to only a nominal rate. As a rule the receivers of such incomes are persons who pay their full share of taxes in indirect but not less certain ways. They are not the ones who do or can shirk their proper share of the expenses of government. They are not the ones who indulge in luxurious living. They are not the ones who pile up vast fortunes by adding interest they cannot spend to capital that is more than sufficient for comfort and for self-indulgence.

The proper object of an income tax is not to oppress the industrious and the struggling and to prevent them from acquiring a modest competence. Its object is to compel those who have incomes in excess of the moderate requirements of living and of rearing a family and of saving against the years of weakness, to do their full share in supporting the Government under which they prosper in an extraordinary degree. The difference between what the very rich man pays and what is paid by the man who has no capital but his hands and his health, under the indirect system of tariff taxation, is a difference that is relatively oppressive to the great majority of the people and partial to the few. A properly graduated income tax, with sharply increasing rates for incomes above $5,000, would correct this injustice and oppress nobody.

With a Treasury deficit of $50,000,000 in sight it would be strange if such a tax were not growing in favor.—New York World.

Too Good to Be True.

It is reported from Washington on the authority of Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee that a tariff bill will probably be ready to lay before the full committee on or before the 10th of November. It is further reported that these members agree that the bill will be reported to the House and placed on the calendar by the 20th of next month.

"If this program is carried out," says a Washington dispatch to the Herald, "it will be possible for the House to conclude consideration of the bill and send it over for the concurrence of the Senate before the Christmas holidays. The probabilities, therefore, are that the measure will become a law during the latter part of February or early in March." To this it is added that the Democrats of the committee are now working every day from early morn to dewy eve upon the various schedules.

All this is encouraging, so far as the committee is concerned. It means that the Democrats of the committee now understand that it is important to respond within a reasonable time to the popular decision at the polls last November. It means, or seems to mean, that the policy of procrastination is no longer regarded with favor by those who are charged with the duty of redeeming the party pledge and the decision of the people to the form of law. It seems to mean that these gentlemen intend to do what they can to get the revised tariff in operation long enough before the next Congressional election to give the people some chance to judge as to its merits. It seems to mean that they are disposed to reject the cowardly counsels of mere politicians, to assume that the people meant what they said at the polls and to rely upon the popular approval.—

Giving Consumers a Chance.

By the grace of the McKinley tariff, which imposes an average duty of 2¼ cents a pound on various sizes of window glass, the American Window Glass Trust is enabled to maintain an absolute monopoly of the domestic market. The advantage of the trust seems to have been pressed too far, for at a meeting held in Chicago on Wednesday last it was agreed that the market—that is, the home market—should remain open for an indefinite period. The explanation offered by the President of the combination was simple enough: "There is no demand for glass; we cannot create trade, and in the face of the light demand there is no necessity to maintain prices." In other words, the prices of the trust, under changed industrial and commercial conditions, have become practically prohibitory, and a new and lower level is to be sought in unlimited competition. When this shall have been determined with reasonable accuracy, to the last penny which consumers can afford to pay, the trust will again step in to "maintain prices" under the shelter of a tariff ranging from 100 to 130 per cent.—Philadelphia Record.

We Will Try Them.

A Yonkers (N. Y.) firm of carpet manufacturers confirm the published report that they are making carpets for export to the English market in order to fill English orders. They are enabled to successfully compete in the English market by reason of improved machinery. There can be no reasonable doubt that after the tariff duty shall have been removed from carpet wools the carpets made in Kensington will find ready sale in every neutral market of the world.—Philadelphia Record.

McKinley Protection Did It.

Wheat sold in New York on Monday at 68 cents per bushel for December options. This is the lowest price ever recorded in the dealings of the Produce Exchange. Such prices do not cover the average cost of production. The only gleam of comfort to be derived from such transactions is the incidental promise of cheap bread to the millions who find their daily bread hard to earn.—Philadelphia Record.

THE NATION'S SOLONS.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Our National Law-Makers and What They Are Doing for the Good of the Country—Various Measures Proposed, Discussed, and Acted Upon.

Doings of Congress.

Dullness reigned in the Senate proper on Monday, but there was some lively skirmishing on the outside when the President's attitude on the compromise bill became known. The debate on the bankruptcy bill began in the House. There is a great deal of determined opposition to the measure led by some of the ablest lawyers in the House, like Culberson, Stone, and Boatner. The bill to provide for the construction of a steam revenue cutter on the great lakes to replace the Andy Johnson was passed. The cost of the new vessel is not to exceed $175,000. The public printing bill and a resolution distributing $237,000 now held by the receiver of the Mormon Church for charitable purposes were also passed.

The Senate met at 10:30 Tuesday morning and soon afterward took up the silver purchase repeal bill, Senator Stewart resuming his speech, which was interrupted Monday when the recess was taken and which he began several weeks ago. In the House Mr. Oates favorably reported from the Judiciary Committee a bill to amend the naturalization laws of the United States. The Speaker announced that he would Wednesday give a decision on the point of order raised Monday relative to the status of a bill once discussed in the morning hour.

The Senate Wednesday resumed its talk on silver. It was apparent to all that the unconditional repeal men felt in high feather. In the House, after the transaction of some minor business, the debate upon the bankruptcy bill was resumed, and occupied the full time.

Thursday was quiet in both houses. The Senate continued talking about silver, though it was conceded by all that the only thing necessary to end the tiresome discussion was an opportunity to submit the repeal bill to a vote. The House was inactive except for some minor transactions, awaiting the return from committee of the new tariff bill. It is reported that a rough draft of the proposed bill has been submitted to the President.

Senator Peffer's amendment to the silver bill, which was to restore the law of 1837 for free coinage alike of gold and silver, was voted on Friday afternoon and lost, the vote standing 28 yeas, 39 nays, and then the everlasting talk was resumed. The House had several squabbles over two resolutions, and twice attempted to take a vote without a quorum, and then adjourned until Monday.

The Senate resumed its session at 11 o'clock Saturday morning with fifty-two Senators present. The urgency deficiency bill was taken up and passed. The joint resolution offered by Mr. Cullom of Illinois, transferring the model battleship Illinois to the State of Illinois as an armory for the naval militia, at the close of the World's Fair, was passed. The repeal bill was then taken up, and Mr. Wolcott addressed the Senate.

LIVING LANTERNS.

How the Deep Sea Is Lighted by Its Finny Inhabitants.

Away down in the dark depths of the ocean there are living lanterns that are borne about to light up the darkness. A queer fish called the "midshipmite" carries the brightest and most striking of all these sea torches. Along its back, under it, and at the base of its fins there are small disks that glow with a clear, phosphorescent light like rows of shining buttons on the young middy's uniform. In this way it gets its name "midshipmite," by which young sailors in the navy are often called. These disks are exactly like small bull's eye lanterns with regular lenses and reflectors. The lenses gather the rays and the reflectors throw them out again. There is a layer of phosphorescent cells between the two, and the entire effect is as perfect as if made by some skillful optician.

Many other fish have "reflectors," many have "lenses," but the "midshipmite" is the only kind that has such splendid specimens of both. The fish is so constructed that when it is frightened by some devouring sea monster it can close its lenses and hide itself in the darkness. It can turn its lantern off and on at will, and then it is always "filled" and ready when wanted. Another marine animal has a luminous bulb that hangs from its chin, and thus throws the light before it to warn it of the approach of enemies. Still another upholds a big light from the extremity of the dorsal fin. Others again have constant supplies of a luminous oil that runs down their sides from the fins, making a bright and constant light all around. Most of the jelly-fish are phosphorescent. These live far down on the very floor of the ocean, where it is always dark and gloomy. The dwellers in these watery depths are provided with lights of their own shining bodies and fins, which illumine their home with a strange though no doubt cheerful glare.

It Didn't Work.

Several distinct varieties of soil clung to his garments and eloquently proclaimed that he had lately walked through not less than three counties. The woman whom he met and accosted at the threshold of the lowly cottage had raspberry stains on her apron.

"Madam," he said, "I trust you will find it in your heart to assist a poor wayfarer."

The woman was silent.

"Madam—"

His voice was tremulous and low.

"—I was once the happy head of a family. I—"

The woman's face softened.

"—had a beautiful wife. Ah, she—"

Tears were standing in the woman's eyes now.

"—was to my mind the sweetest and best of wives. But the dream was rudely dispelled when—"

The woman leaned forward and held her breath.

"—her father lost everything in a wheat pinch."

The woman gulped down a sob, entered the house and slammed the door. —Detroit Tribune.

The Greatest Medical Discovery of the Age.

KENNEDY'S MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

DONALD KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, MASS.,

Has discovered in one of our common pasture weeds a remedy that cures every kind of Humor, from the worst Scrofula down to a common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder humor). He has now in his possession over two hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

When the lungs are affected it causes shooting pains, like needles passing through them; the same with the Liver or Bowels. This is caused by the ducts being stopped, and always disappears in a week after taking it.

If the stomach is foul or bilious it will cause squeamish feelings at first.

No change of diet ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it. Dose, one tablespoonful in water at bedtime. Read the Label. Send for Book.

ROBBED OF TERRORS.

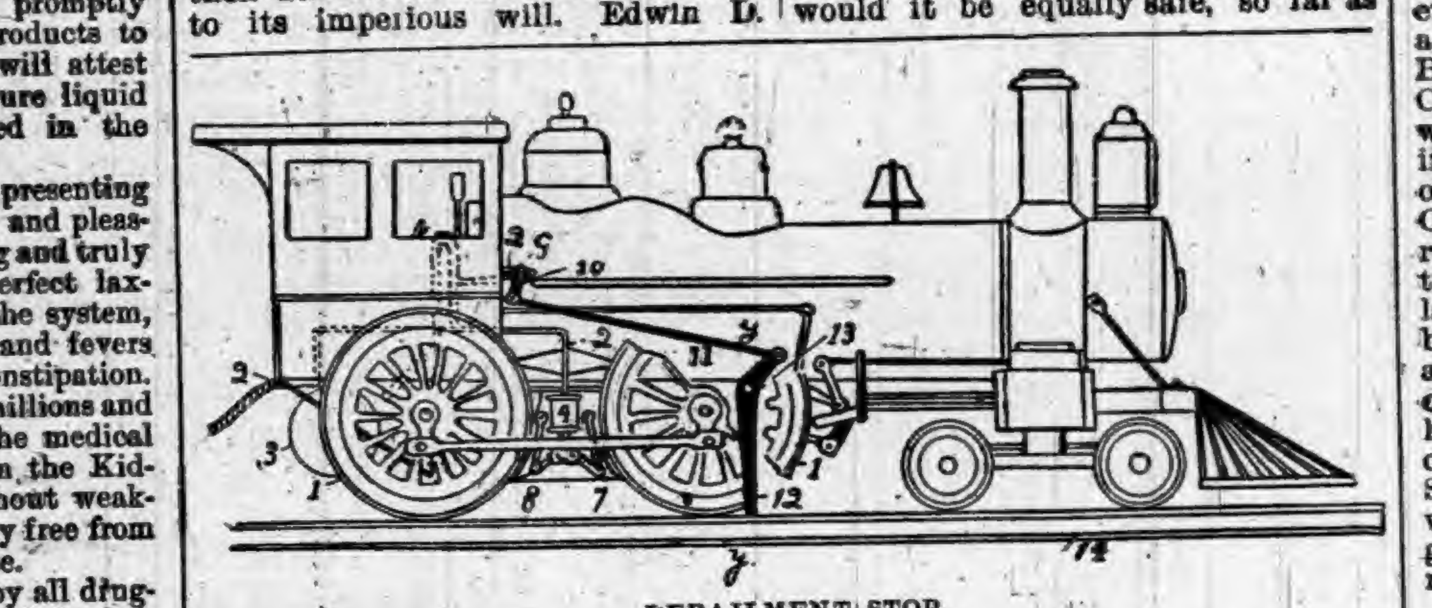
RAILROAD TRAVEL NO LONGER WILL BE DANGEROUS.

Mechanical Devices Which Insure Comparative Immunity from the Perils of the Track—Preventing Accidents from Derailments, Collisions, Open Draws, etc.

Railroading Simplified.

How to prevent accidents from the derailment of a train of cars, how to check a train moving at lightning speed at the entrance of an open drawbridge supposed to be shut, and thus prevent the train from plunging into the yawning abyss with terrific loss of life; how to bring as summarily to a standstill a train about to go on a trestle bridge a span of which has been suddenly swept away by some swift destruction of storm, or flood, or fire; how to prevent a train from being run into by another train, with the wreck, perhaps, of both train and instantaneous death to many passengers—these are problems of gravest importance and supremest public interest. These are problems that come home to the hearts and bosoms of everybody, for everybody travels nowadays on railroads.

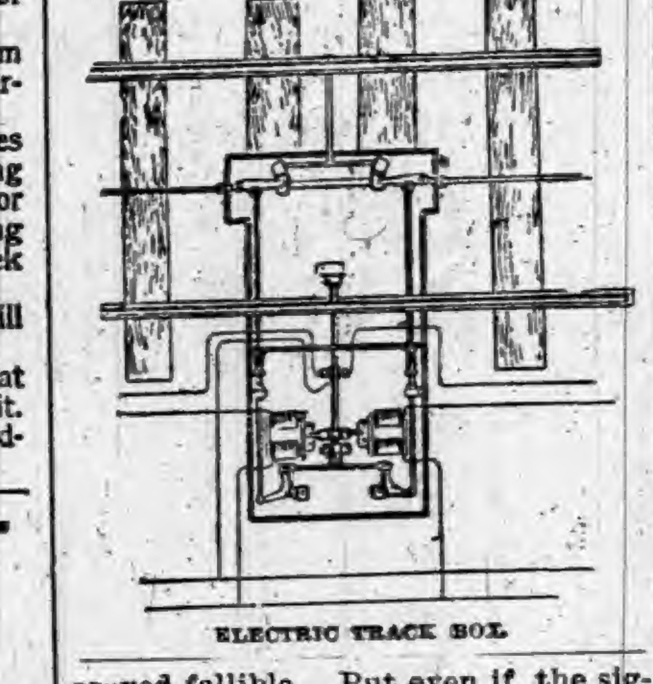
It is believed that these problems, seemingly impossible of solution as they appear at first glance, have been solved. It is not, however, to be wondered at. It is the natural but inevitable sequence of progress in mechanical science—a step onward in the great march of invention, which stops not at the seemingly impossible, but ever looking to the far off, unattained and dim, challenges combat with the most subtle and stubborn forces of nature, and in their utilization makes them subject to its imperious will. Edwin D. Graff, of New York, claims to be the fortunate solver of the gigantic problems to which reference has been made. For each of his four inventions he has taken out patents in this country and Canada, in England, and in all the leading governments of both hemispheres. He has labored on them for years, and has only recently perfected them. The present description of them is the first that has ever been given.



DERAILMENT STOP.

Electric Signal System.

The electric signal system is a wonder in its way, combining a usefulness hitherto unknown in the art of signaling. At present the only signals are visual signals, and the vast majority of them depend for their correctness upon human operation, which has time and time again proved fallible. But even if the signal has been set correctly the chance of safety is by no means assured. The engineer, for instance, may be consulting his clock, steam gauge, water gauge, air pressure gauge injector, lubricator, or any of the thousand and one things that this argus-eyed individual is supposed to keep watch over, or he may, or he may not, have dropped dead or become paralyzed, or be sleepy or dozing when the signal is passed, or it may be storming violently, or the signal light may have gone out, or the fireman may have the furnace door open, making it impossible to see out of the cab window on account of the glare of light within. Any of these things may cause an engineer to fail to observe the feeble red gleam that stands between him and destruction. The audible signal, however, is open to no such objections. Silent, yet vigilant, it travels with him in his cab mile after mile, and when its brisk ringing breaks in upon the thunder and crash of the engine as it groans under its load of precious human life the engineer knows that the time of danger is at hand and delay means death.

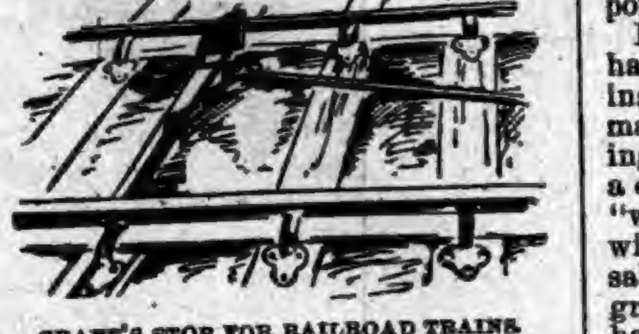


ELECTRIC TRACK BOX.

How the Electric Signal Works.

The electric signal consists of a rod, rail, or conductor, laid down the center of the track the entire length of the same. Its electric continuance is broken at intervals of every 1,500 or 2,000 feet, and a small piece of German silver—resistance wire—is inserted. The locomotive equipment is situated within the cow-catcher, and consists of a brush or roller, adapted to make electrical contact with the central rod, rail or conductor, an electric bell in the cab and a battery of one or two Laclanche cells. One of the poles of the bell circuit is connected to the brush or roller, and the other, after passing through a pole-changing switch, is grounded in the locomotive. It is so arranged that all locomotives going north have the positive pole connected to the roller and the negative grounded in the locomotive, and all locomotives proceeding south are reversely connected, so that when two locomotives thus equipped approach near enough to one another to overcome the resistance interposed between them a circuit is established from one to the other, causing both bells to ring and continue ringing while they remain within dangerous proximity.

The block signal portion of this system is arranged so that at certain intervals along the track of a mile, more or less, the road is divided into blocks or sections. At these places a track instrument box is inserted. The track portion of the track instrument box contains two tongues or switches that normally lie along and complete the continuity of the center rod, rail or conductor, but by means arranged within the box, so that when a train passes over it it moves one of the switches across a short insulated point and makes a contact, which short circuits a train following and causes its bell to ring when it shall have approached sufficiently near. When the train which effected the movement of the switch reaches the next succeeding track instrument box it repeats the operation and restores the first mentioned box to its normal or safety position. The movement to danger is made mechanically and the return movement is effected electrically by means of a magnet in each box, which, on being energized, releases a spring that provides for the return of the box to its normal position. Thus an open circuit system is provided that is so constructed that should anything happen to the source of electrical supply no clear signal would be given, and even should the system become damaged or broken yet would it be equally safe, so far as giving a clear or safety signal is concerned when danger existed.



GRAFF'S STOP FOR RAILROAD TRAINS.

Derailment Stop.

The derailment stop consists of a lever inside the driving wheels of the locomotive and within the trucks of the cars, whose lower end depends within a few inches of the top surface of the rail. It is pivoted so as to permit of a movement longitudinally of the train and its upper free end, which extends beyond the pivot, is connected to a link or arm, which in turn is connected with the handle of a cock situated in the main train pipe of the train's air brake system. When the derailment takes place the lower end is brought in contact with the ground either by the wheels cutting into the earth or by a sufficiency of the periphery of the wheel descending between two cross ties. By the forward motion of the train the lower end of this lever is vibrated rearwardly, the upper end moving forwardly from the pivot and by its forward motion exerting a pull upon the link connected with the handle of the cock in the main train pipe, opening the same and causing the air to escape, thus applying the brakes.

Co-operating with this ingenious device is the drawbridge mechanism, which consists of a sliding rod lying at and across the land end of the bridge terminal, and projecting out sufficiently to be engaged by a bracket or arm fastened to the bridge and moving with it. This sliding rod has coiled upon it a spring, so arranged that when relieved from the pressure of the arm or plate it springs out, and upon the return of the bridge it is pushed back and the spring compressed. Pivoted to the cross-ties is a bell-crank whose ends are engaged respectively by the sliding transverse rod and a line of gaspipe lever running parallel with the track. This is carried back a sufficient distance and there connected to a crank-arm, which in turn is connected to a rock-shaft lying transversely of the tracks, and to which are connected at suitable places sector-shaped trip-pieces, which are raised and lowered by the rotation of the transverse rock-shaft as the bridge is opened and closed through means of above-described mechanism. These trips when in operative or raised position, which is the position they occupy when the bridge is opened, engage the levers of the airbrake system, and by turning them back apply the brakes and stop the train. Upon the closing of the bridge they are of course turned down and out of operative position. An engineer approaching an open drawbridge first passes a signal warning him to stop, and failing to obey it for any reason his levers are struck and turned back by the stops and he comes to a standstill upon the rails.

Contagiousness of Leprosy.

In a paper giving the result of his careful and prolonged investigations of this subject, Dr. Duncan Buckley declares that it is not proven that any number of individuals have ever acquired the disease from direct contact with others affected, or that it has ever been traced, in any proportion of cases worth mentioning, directly from one person to another. There is strong reason to suspect, he says, that it may first be introduced into the system by the way of food, fish being the most likely of all substances to furnish and convey the poison; heredity probably accounts for a share of the cases, but the disease is not necessarily transmitted by inheritance; inoculation with leprous matter may be the means of conveying the disease when all the conditions are favorable.

Quizzical Great Men.

Daniel Webster was one of the great men who like to make remarks of a character intended to puzzle simple minds. Stopping one day at a country inn to dinner on his way to Marshfield, he was asked by the hostess if he usually had a good appetite.

"Madam," answered Webster, "I sometimes eat more than I do at other times; but never less."

The inhabitants of the village where this profound Hibernicism was uttered have probable been at work ever since trying to comprehend its exact purport.

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher is said to have brought about a great overhauling of Bibles and concordances by remarking, at several hotel and boarding-house tables where he had taken a chance and indifferent meal, that "we should eat what is set before us with fear and trembling, for conscience' sake;" and many persons were, no doubt, greatly delighted to learn that they had caught a great divine in a misquotation of Scripture.

In A Child's Hospital.

It was always expected that new patients would cry for at least half a day. Umberto was a rogue who seemed to take delight in prolonging this period of intiation. He was an Italian boy of three, with a large head, big brown half-wondering and half-roguish eyes, and the crookedest legs, which made him waddle like a duck. Once it was noticed that even on the second and third days after admission some children in his ward would be crying for home as in the very beginning—a thing explained only when the tricks of this young rascal were discovered. He would watch until all was quiet and the nurse had stepped out of the ward for a minute on some duty, and then would call to the new comer, "Say, say, doan you wan' to see you' mudda?" Whereupon the floodgates would open once more.—Harper's Young People.

An Incident in a Dark Tunnel.

Two young married men in the Salem excursion to Newport last week played a rather sweet joke on their wives. Before entering the long tunnel at Elk City each was sitting with the other's wife. They agreed to exchange seats in the long tunnel and each kiss his own wife. Well, they did as agreed. One of the young women screamed terribly and attracted the attention of the whole car, and all had a hearty laugh at her expense, when the light broke in upon her, resisting fiercely and in her husband's arms. The other one kept perfectly still, and she and her husband had a good laugh on each other, when the light broke on them. She said she did not know but what it was her husband, and did not want to give it away if it was not.—Salem Journal.

Couldn't Get a Word in Edgeways.

"What you got there?" asked a friend.

"Parrot; I'm taking it home to my wife. She always wanted one."

"I hope you'll have better luck than I did with the one I gave my wife."

"What happened to it?"

"Don't know my wife, do you?"

"No."

"Neither did the parrot. It wanted to talk during the daytime and couldn't get a chance while my wife was around so it stayed awake at night to do its talking and the poor thing died of insomnia before two weeks."—Detroit Free Press.

Questionable Compliment.

A candid and well-meaning professor, who had witnessed the performance of a little play in a private house, in which his hostess had taken the leading part, met the lady as she came from behind the curtain.

"Madam," he said, rushing up to her, "you played excellently; the part fits you to perfection."

"Oh, no, professor," said the lady, modestly; "a young and pretty woman is needed for that part."

"But, madam," persisted the professor, "you have positively proved the contrary!"

Sorrow in the Near Future

Awaits those who disregard symptoms of liver disorder. Be on time if you feel distress in the region of the liver, if your visage is sallow, eyeballs yellowish, tongue coated, or if you are troubled with constipation, sick headache and occasional dizziness. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will banish these unpleasant symptoms, and should be used early and persistently. The bowels are relaxed without pain or griping, and are not weakened by it as they are by the action of a violent purgative. Digestion grows more active when it is used and the system invigorated, because it insures assimilation of the food constituents by the blood. Kidney complaints, malaria and rheumatism are overcome by this searching and thorough remedy.

A Strange Superstition.

In Bosnia the people have believed at all times that a bridge could not be firm and lasting unless a human being was walled up in it. Thus there is a legend connected with the handsome Roman bridge at Mostar, which says that the fine arch across the Narenta could not be finished until the architect walled up in it a bridal pair. Now that a solid bridge is being built across the Save at Brazcka this superstition is revived. It is rumored everywhere that gypsies are stealing children to sell them to the contractors, who will wall one up in each pillar.

Distress in the Stomach —Tired and Nervous

"New York City, June 22, 1893.

"I was in misery with dyspepsia. Sometimes I had no appetite, and when I did eat a hearty meal I felt much distress for hours after. I did not seem to have any ambition; was restless at night, and in the morning tired and nervous. My digestion was irregular and unsatisfactory. My wife urged me to take Hood's Sarsaparilla, and the result is that I have Naval Etiquette.

An English Admiral who was once vising a French flagship laid down his quid on a convenient bulkhead before entering the officers' quarters. When he came out again he was astonished to find the quid in the place where he had left it.

"Pooh!" said he, in the hearing of some of the sailors, "you Frenchmen will never be true sea dogs. No English bluejacket, now, would ever have left an Admiral's quid alone."

Whereupon one of the French sailors stepped up, touched his cap, and said:

"Beg pardon, Admiral; I was chewing your quid while you were in there, but I put it back, you know, when I heard you coming out."—Chicago Post.

What He Heard.

"Fine sermon, wasn't it?" asked one of Farmer Peters's boarders, referring to a scholarly discourse with which the Meadville meeting-house congregation had been favored that morning by a city clergyman.

"Mebbe," returned Farmer Peters.

"Why," persisted the boarder, "that man knows more about the Bible, he has made a deeper study of Biblical history and geography, than almost any other minister in this country."

"Has he, now?" inquired Farmer Peters, mildly. "Well, then, I reckon the trouble must've been with me. You see I'd cal'lated I sh'd hear somethin' about the way to Heaven, an' I only learned the way from Jerusalem to Jericho."

Origin of the Fork.

In the Middle Ages, the fork appeared only as a curiosity, and the use of it was not the same as that to which it is now put. It was employed for eating fruit or slices of bread and cheese. We find a few forks figuring in the treasury of John II., Duke of Burgundy; and Gaveston, a favorite of Edward II. of England, owned, says an historian of the time, sixty-nine silver spoons and three forks for eating pears with. At this epoch they had but two tines, and it is from that circumstance that is derived their name.

"Sponging House."

A sponging house was a house kept by the Sheriff's officers in London to which a person arrested for debt was taken, and where he was kept for twenty-four hours before being imprisoned, so that his friends might have a chance to settle the debt. The place was called Sponging House because of the extortionate charges for any sort of accommodation. When imprisoned for debt was finally abolished in 1869 the last sponging houses disappeared.

"Sweet Charity."

In the Artists' Exhibition of 1893 at the New York Academy of Design, there was exhibited an oil-painting by J. L. G. Ferris, entitled "Sweet Charity." Its richness of coloring commanded instant attention, while the lesson it taught was so impressive that one naturally returned to it for a second view.

Its subject is a young lady of colonial times who is on an errand of charity to one of the poorer families of the town. She has a sensible, charming face, which expresses with remarkable fidelity the sentiment of her errand. There is not a home that this charming picture will not ornament. It must be seen to be appreciated.

"Sweet Charity" was purchased by the Publishers of the Youth's Companion and has been reproduced in colors in large size, 14½ by 21.

It will be sent to all new subscribers to the Companion who send $1.75 for a year's subscription, and the paper will also be sent Free from the time the subscription is received, to January, 1894, and for a full year from that date, to January, 1895. This offer includes the Double Souvenir Numbers published at Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's. Address

THE BEST PLASTER—Dampen a piece of flannel with Chamberlain's Pain Balm and bind it on over the seat of pain. It is better than any plaster. When the lungs are sore such an application on the chest and another on the back between the shoulder blades, will often prevent pneumonia. There is nothing so good for a lame back or a pain in the side. A sore throat can nearly always be cured in one night by applying a flannel bandage dampened with Pain Balm. 50 cent bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

WATERLOO.

Fine Mackinaw trout and other fish were sold on Wayne street last Thursday and Friday.

Tuesday evening of this week the L. M. C. held their regular session at the home of Mrs. Blair.

Last Tuesday, Mrs. Huber and Mrs. Carpenter drove to Garrett, each having a relative living there whom they wished to visit.

A train of twenty empty passenger cars and one caboose passed through this place Tuesday morning going west, probably to help bring away the crowd of visitors that must be there.

Two families moved into town from the north Monday, and judging from the quantity and quality of the furniture and household belongings, both are well to do and able to pay their debts—a consideration in these times.

Notwithstanding the fair managers declared positively through the press that the fair would close Oct. 30, at the last moment, they state having decided at a recent meeting to continue it for an unlimited period, "depending on the weather and the popular will."

The quartet, consisting of Mesdames Huber, Bartholomew, Carpenter and Maxwell started at 7 o'clock Tuesday morning to drive to Kendallville to visit with Rev. and Mrs. DeWeese. They went well provided with chicken and other goodies, expecting to reach their destination in time to cook their dinner, which of course was to be shared with the family they visited.

Friday, October 30, while F. N. Beidler was standing on a rickety step ladder taking down the decorations in the opera house after the reunion, he fell, striking across a chair. He reached home by the aid of an old broom handle utilized as a cane and holding to the buildings on the way. It was at first thought some of his ribs were broken, but it is since concluded that some of the ligaments holding the ribs in place are torn away. He has been down street several times, but has much pain and when he lies down, cannot move or turn over without aid. His injuries are such as time must heal.

Last Thursday night, Wm. Bigler's residence in Hudson was burned down together with the household goods upstairs, in the dining room, kitchen and cellar, except one gasolene stove. Mrs. Bigler was in Ohio visiting friends, where she had been for five weeks. Mr. B. had packed all the goods in the front rooms down stairs Thursday, preparatory to sending them to Mrs. B., he intending to go also as soon as he sold or made arrangements in regard to other property here. All that was packed was saved. There was insurance on both building and goods, which, if paid, will not make the loss very heavy. The railroad is very near, and it is supposed sparks from an engine caused the fire.

BUTLER.

A few people are still moving out of town, but about as many are moving in, so we may, by the by, get even again.

Frank Brink and Lou Gibson are moving to Butler to open a law office. Butler has been short of lawyers for some time. This will increase the number.

J. A. Campbell mislaid a valuable note case while at Hudson Friday last, but did not miss it till nine o'clock Saturday. On returning hastily to Hudson, he found it safe in the care of David Ling.

Butler people continued to patronize the fair to its last day. Among those who went to be present at its close were J. W. Oberlin and wife, Ollie Oberlin, M. F. Campbell, Will Whetsel, Henry Maxwell, Silas Ocker and many others.

CONCORD.

Lewis Howey was at St. Joe Monday.

Mrs. Emma Elson drove to St. Joe Monday.

Mrs. Robert Culbertson is reported much better.

G. W. Draggoo was in Spencerville, last Saturday.

C. H. Brown and wife, of St. Joe, were calling on friends here Sunday.

Several attended the White sale Saturday, but every thing sold at low prices.

Mr. Grube, of Ohio, is spending a few weeks with his daughter, Mrs. Phillips.

Miss Williams and Mrs. Carr will shortly leave for their home in Michigan.

Mrs. Koch and daughters, of Fairview, drove over to Anna Saturday afternoon.

C. Keller and son Grant, helped to wind up the fair, being there the last days.

Delbert Draggoo frieghted away two large loads of poultry last week. Dell is a hustler.

Mrs. H. Jenkins and daughter Blanche, Leighty, of St. Joe, came up to Tell Elson's Tuesday.

Bent Phillips and wife have been entertaining company from Mt. Vernon, Ohio, the last two weeks.

The farmers are having fine weather to harvest their corn and passably fair quality. The wheat fields are looking green.

25th of September brought a burglar. 25th of October a robber at the Ervin store. He secceeded in getting all of Ervin's change, but held the revolver in his face before he gave it up.

The Last Days of the Fair.

Our last article closed our experience on Saturday, Oct 21. We spent our Sabbath in the city, though many thousands visited the fair on that day. We visited many points of interest, some of the great churches, and in the afternoon joined a seemingly endless tide, surging towards Lincoln Park. Saw a number of people from Butler and vicinity, all bent on making the most of their time while in the city. The attractions of this park undergo many changes and the objects that seem of the greatest interest at one visit may have been wholly removed at the next visit, and some new attractions substituted. Upon many former visits, the sea lions were the great objects of attention. We have stood for an hour and watched their graceful gambols, as they swam and dove about the pool in which they were confined and listened to their barking. They are there no more, and the pool that once echoed to their merry music is now the sporting place for ducks and geese. The attractions now are the buffalo, deer, elk, bear, wolves, lions, prairie dogs, and some other small animals. We tired of the park and returned to the city and later to our home near 47th street on Evans Avenue, where we spent a quiet evening to prepare ourselves for the tramp, tramp, tramp of the morrow. Early Monday morning found us walking across lots to the fair, a distance of about a mile. On our way, we passed the Woman's Dormitory, about which we had read so much and knew so little. It is a plain two-story frame building, unpainted, and occupied two or more sides of a whole square. It looked severely plain and from appearances seems to have been but poorly patronized. We reached the gates quite early, but found that tens of thousands had preceded us, and a long line of persons were formed, each waiting his turn to secure his admission ticket. This line constantly increased and looking back as we entered the gate, we saw it extending back about two hundred feet. This morning, the first thing to attract our attention was the Children's Building, a moderate sized two-story frame structure that will long be an object of the most lively remembrance to the thousands of young and loving mothers who have left their dear ones to the care of the nurses, while they have enjoyed a few hours of sight seeing, trembling every minute for the safety of their darling, so strangely disposed of, namely:—checked as baggage and left to the care of strangers. The nursery consists of two large, airy rooms, filled with cribs, cabs, dolls and all manner of play things to amuse the little ones left to partially care for themselves, while their parents enjoy the occasion. Upon our arrival, the rooms were not yet opened, but the mouths of about forty crying babies were wide open, as their parents formed in a long and increasing line, waited their chance to deposit their precious burdens, and when all had been received, a vast crowd surged about the adjoining room, intent on securing at least one glance upon the sleeping, playing, crying mass of babies, that has been old since Cain wore long clothes, yet always new to us all. We left this scene of varied interest and passing through the Hall of Public comfort, again entered Transportation where new things were still in store. We saw the new car and engine combined that will be driven one hundred and fifty miles an hour over the great elevated electric line that will soon connect Chicago and St. Louis. The train is of peculiar construction, having a motor at each end with the single car swinging between the motors. The track consists of three rails, the middle one elevated above the others, and the train so fastened to this rail that no chance remains for its leaving the track, so in its use the ditching of trains would be a thing of the past. Noon approaching, we sought Indiana building to partake of our lunch, where good, cheap coffee was found in abundance and where we saw the COURIER and many other state papers and met many dear acquaintances from different parts of the state.

SAILED THE SEAS 38 YEARS.

One of His Experiences.

For thirty-eight years Capt. Loud followed the sea, most of that time as master of a vessel, and upon retiring from the water was appointed by the Secretary of the United States Treasury to superintend the seal fisheries in Alaska, which position he held five years. He relates one experience as follows:

"For several years I had been troubled with general nervousness and pain in the region of my heart. My greatest affliction was sleeplessness; it was almost impossible at any time to obtain rest and sleep. Having seen Dr. Miles' remedies advertised I began using Nervine. After taking a small quantity the benefit received was so great that I was positively alarmed, thinking the remedy contained opiates which would finally be injurious to me; but on being assured by the druggist that it was perfectly harmless, I continued it together with the Heart Cure. Today I can conscientiously say that Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine and New Heart Cure did more for me than anything I had ever taken. I had been treated by eminent physicians in New York and San Francisco without benefit. I owe my present good health to the judicious use of these most valuable remedies, and heartily recommend them to all afflicted as I was."—Capt. A. P. Loud, Hampden, Me.

Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine and New Cure are sold by all druggists on a positive guarantee, or by Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind., on receipt of price, $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5, express prepaid. They are free from all opiates and dangerous drugs.

CORRESPONDENCE

WATERLOO.

We are having glorious weather for a few days, but that does not prevent the wood and coal sale being active, in preparation for the cold days to come.

One section of the ladies of the Presbyterian church will have a chicken-pie social Friday evening at the home of Mrs. F. W. Willis. A general invitation is extended.

England is uneasy, and fears to lose her naval supremacy. The alliance between France and Russia may cause war in Europe within a short time, and war must affect America more or less.

Mrs. Klttz drove over with her husband to Auburn Junction, where she left him. Mrs. Phil Morel accompanied them to Auburn, where she had a short visit with her son, returning with Mrs. Klotz.

Frank Bevier has moved his family into part of Mrs. Barnhart's residence on South Franklin street. This does not speak bad for Waterloo. Dwellings are generally occupied and many hold two families.

Our new postmaster, W. H. Getts has taken possession of his office. Miss Blanche Davidson is his assistant. Miss Maud McBride is in for the present until the new occupants become familiar with their duties.

Mrs. Winslow went over to Auburn last Friday to pay her taxes. Several other Waterloo people were there the same day, probably on the same business, among the number being Charles Kelley, Ex-postmaster McBride and Charles Rempis.

Wm. Rose has moved into town again and occupies his house on Elm street as of yore. Thus it is. Many who leave town are unsatisfied until they return. Mr. Rose's family occupy but a part of the building, a tenant who has lived there a long time still retaining a portion of the residence.

The four ladies of the M. E. church who went last week to make a surprise on Rev DeWeese and family at Kendallville, were just in time. They found them with their goods packed and nearly ready to start for Kansas, which they did two days later. It was fortunate for both sides that the guests were provided with dinner.

A poor Pole has made an important discovery within the past month. It is the solidification of petroleum. The substance is between beeswax and tallow in general appearance, yellowish white, has no taste or odor and burns much like a candle. A wealthy American living in Paris is in possession of the secret and substance, but it is on its way to this country, where it will be fully tested by the Standard Oil Company. The cost of solidification is small.

Henry Espey has returned to Waterloo from Arkansas where he has lived for some years. He finds it very pleasant to be again in the town where two of his children were born and where he feels at home. Mrs. Espey died some months since. The youngest daughter is married and lives at Lima, O., where her husband has a good position with a railroad company. Carrie, the second daughter, will follow her father to Waterloo shortly.

Hallowe'en was observed in Waterloo, as usual, although in a more respectable manner, not so much damage being done nor property destroyed. It is said a car load of eggs was stolen and used. How true this is, your correspondent cannot say, although a window in sight gives evidence that eggs were thrown. One act of the evening is worthy of record. Miss Allie Philips and Miss Deventer went out with their classes, taking with them all the vegetables and clothing they could accumulate honestly, which were distributed among poor families in need. This charitable act is worth of being followed.

Mrs. M. Sullivan and daughter Blanche of Avilla, were in the city Sunday guests of Mrs. Carpenter.

The way to get all the news from Garrett is to subscribe for the COURIER. It cannot help but please.

John Bates, of Corunna, was arrested and arraigned before Mayor Camp on a charge of drunk and disorderly conduct. He was fined ten dollars and costs.

The Knights of Pythias and Pythian Sisters attended the lodge at Auburn Monday night. A banquet was given and those present report a very pleasant time.

The remains of Engineer John Harrison, formerly of this city, but later of Stuart, Iowa, were brought to Garrett Friday for burial. The family have the sympathy of the entire community.

W. L. Webster & Co gave their annual cloak and wrap sale last Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday. They had a very large and well selected line of garments on sale and made a great success of it.

Prof. J. A. Moore, of Charlottesville, Va., and Fred Schulthess, of this place, have purchased the furniture stock of Merica & Weaver. They are both practical business men and will without a doubt, make a success of it.

The Young Ladies' "Guild" of the Episcopal church opened their parish house last Friday evening by a social, which was a great success. The parish house is a fine building, inside and out and reflects great credit on the pastor, Thos. B. Kemp, P. P.

The hardware store of Clark & Teeters was entered by burglars one evening last week. They gained an entrance by cutting the glass in one of the windows at the rear of the store. Just about the time they had begun to get to work on the inside, the night watch came along and the thieves made a hasty escape. Nothing was taken.

The six year old son of John Lumm met with a serious accident while on his way to school one day last week. He was running across the road to meet his teacher, when he fell and Kingsbury's large team wagon, loaded with coal passed over his abdomen, the horses also struck his head. He was taken home and lay in a precarious condition for several days, but at this writing he is said to be somewhat improved.

A good story is told on a Garrett man, who went to Chicago to see the fair. Arriving there he asked a policeman at the depot where the fair was situated. The police thinking the man meant the great general store "The Fair," he directed him to that establishment and according to the story he staid there all day, and might have staid longer, but he asked a lady clerk where he would find the "Midway Plaisance." When told where he was he actually wilted.

Two ignorant people, a male and female gave a "show" on the streets here Saturpay night. They gave an exhibition of rope walking, trapeze performing, etc. After about one-half of the "entertainment" was over the woman passed through the crowd and took up a collection, which amounted to ninety cents. they said that they had just closed an engagement with a circus and had hard luck, but were trying to get to Columbus Ohio, by "hard and honest labor." They set sail Monday morning, where they would try and find more suckers than they found here.

California in 3½ Days.

Over two-thirds of the distance between the Atlantic and the Pacific in half a week. Such is the record made by travelers between Chicago and the Pacific coast, via the North Western Line, the quickest route for visitors to the Midwinter Fair. Palace drawing-room sleeping cars leave Chicago daily, and run through to San Francisco without change, dining cars serving all meals en route. Tourist sleeping cars, offering an exceptionally favorable opportunity for making the trip in a most comfortable and economical manner, are also run. Died,

Della Miles was born Jan. 27, 1875, and died Oct. 20, 1893, aged 18 years, 8 months and 23 days. Sister Della was converted to God in the month of February, 1890, at a revival meeting held in the Church of God, conducted by Elder Joseph Neil, of Montpelier, Ohio. At this meeting she came into fellowship with the Church of God, and in June following, with others, she was baptized by Elder W. W. Lovet, in Cedar Creek.

Sister Della was but fifteen years of age when she embraced religion, and so lived until death called her away. Her life was certainly an example worthy of imitation. Her suffering during these months of affliction can never be told; but she bore it with true christian courage, without murmuring or complaining, yielding in humble submission to the will of God, always manifesting a readiness for death, saying that her way was clear. She could talk of death as though it was a matter of small importance to her how soon death would come, and when asked for the last time, how it was with her she replied "It is all well." Oh, what strong faith in the Savior's saving power in the hour of dissolution!

During the last days of her life she made all necessary arrangements for her funeral, selecting her pastor, text, (twenty-third psalm) pall bearers and singers; also the the songs to be sung at her funeral. These requests were complied with as near as it was possible.

She leaves a kind and loving mother, who has so faithfully done her duty in caring for her daughter during the long months of her affliction. She also leaves one brother and many other friends to mourn her early departure. But they need not mourn as for those who have no hope, but may feel assured their loss is her eternal gain. She will be missed in the church, in the Sunday school and by her many friends and associates.

The funeral services were Oct. 22, conducted by Elder Joseph Neil, from the Church of God, in the presence of a large audience. Interment in Woodlawn cemetery.

Resolutions of Respect.

We the committee appointed to draft resolutions on the death of Della Miles, beg leave to submit to the following:

WHEREAS, death, the most unwelcome of all guests, has entered the home of our beloved friend, Mrs. Kate Miles, and removed from her household one of her gems, her darling daughter, and removed from our midst a bright Sabbath school worker, and

WHEREAS, there comes to each one of us almost a personal bereavement, when we see the vacant seat, and that familiar voice is stilled. Therefore be it

Resolved, that we extend to the mother and brother our heartfelt sympathy in this their sad bereavement, and that we bow in humble submission to the will of Him who doeth all things well, and may her example as a christian be followed by many others, and the evidence which she gave, long be remembered.

Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be given to the family, placed in the record book of the Sunday school, and published in some city paper.

"Lives of Great Men."

The Shelby Democrat, among its many bright things, has a new parody on the famous poem of Longfellow. It reads like this:

Lives of great men all remind us,
  Honest men won't stand no chance;
The more we work there grows behind us
  Bigger patches on our pants,
On our pants once new and glossy,
  Now are stripes of different hue,
All because subscribers linger
  And won't pay us what is due;
Then let us be up and doing,
  Send in your mite, however small,
Or when snow of winter strikes us,
  We may have no pants at all.

AROUND THE WORLD.

INTELLIGENCE FROM ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD.

George B. Swift Chosen Mayor of Chicago Pro Tem.—One Negro Kills Three Others With an Axe—Murder and Suicide—Deposed Judges Can't Be Reinstated.

Chicago's New Mayor.

Chicago special: The wrangle over the election of mayor pro tem, was settled Monday night by the choice of Alderman George B. Swift, he receiving sixty-two votes to five for Alderman McGillen, one blank being cast. The Democratic alderman remained in the Council Chamber until 7:30, the time set for the regular meeting. This was to keep McGillen in the chair on the plea that the original meeting of which he had been chairman, had not adjourned. The Repulican aldermen were locked up in a room half a square from the city hall to keep away from the sergeant-at-arms, who was instructed by the Democrats to bring them over. At 7:20 the Republican aldermen followed by a small army of anherents marched in a column of two to the Council Chamber, where they were greeted with loud cheers and laughter by the waiting Democrats. The leaders of the two factions quietly got together and settled matters amicably.

Deposed Judges Can't be Reinstated.

Chief Justice Fuller in the Supreme Court denied the applications of Parsons and Niniger, district attorney and marshal for Northern Alabama, for leave to file petitions of mandamus commanding the Alabama District Court to reinstate them in the offices from which they were removed by President Cleveland. These men claimed that they could not be removed until their term expired. The court did not go into the merits of the matter, saying simply that the cases were not properly presented for its consideration.

Triple Murder.

Oklahoma City (Okla.) special: News has just reached here of what will probably become a triple murder in the country northeast of here. A negro named Clark, his wife, and a daughter were found in their cabin, their throats cut and their skulls fractured by blows from an axe. They had been assaulted and robbed of some $200 by a negro who had lived with them, named John Milligan. Mrs. Clark was dead. The other two can scarcely survive.

Preparing to Fight.

About fifty of the most prominent ministers of the Presbyterian Church in large cities will meet in Cleveland, Ohio, next week, to decide upon a policy for the future. Some of the most prominent Brigg's men in the country will be present. The call is issued by a committee of the New York synod, appointed after the disposal of the Briggs case.

A Bloody Crime.

At Elyria, Ohio, Charles Manning shot and instantly killed his wife and her cousin, Mrs. W. R. White, and then put a bullet in his own brain, dying almost instantly. Manning had been sued for divorce and was crazy drunk at the time of the crime. The deed was premeditated, as he left a card for publication.

Assassin Prendergast.

Chicago special: Mayor Harrison's assasin, Prendergast, appeared for trial the other day, but upon the request of attorneys secured for him by his brother, a letter carrier, the case was continued by Judge Dunne until November 27. The lawyer for the defense stated that they desired time to study the case.

Warning From Yale.

The Yale authorities announce that no more Thanksgiving foot ball games can be played at New York if it shall be shown by the coming Thanksgiving game that such disorders as have occurred after these contests in former years cannot be checked.

Two Japanese World's Fair exhibitors have secured licences to wed a couple of Egyptian girls from the streets of Cairo. Ten Magi married Juanita Charbona, and Samuel Watanabe married Cora Ragabab.

Provisions for the Destitute.

Murder and Suicide.

Charles Martin, one of the wealthiest young men in Dallas, Texas, shot his mistress, Patty Cole, three times, killing her. He then shot himself.

Typos Withdraw.

The Jefferson City, Mo., Typographical Union has withdrawn from the State Federation of Labor on account of it endorsing the pardon of the anarchists by Gov. Altgeld.

It is said all the Chinese in the United States (approximating 100,000) can be registered in sixty days, if they will promptly take advantage of the opportunity.

Attempts to Rob a Bank.

Harrisonville (Mo.) special: Thomas R. Edwards, once a prominent politician of Kansas City, Mo., and reputed a millionaire, and once Assessor of that city by appointment and twice Assessor of the county by election, assaulted the cashier of the First National Bank, but failed to secure any money and is under arrest.

About noon a stranger entered the First National Bank of this city, said his name was Thomas H. Edwards and asked Cashier G. M. Houston, who was alone at the time, to cash a draft for him. Houston told Edwards that it would be necessary for him to be identified. Edwards demurred a moment and then said something about being cold. Houston invited him back to the stove and accompanying him bent over the fire to stir it. Instantly Edwards dealt the cashier a heavy blow on the head with his fist, knocking him down, and then, springing upon the fallen man, kicked and beat him fearfully. Houston struggled desperately and finally freeing himself rushed for his revolver which was in a drawer in the front of the bank. Edwards, who was unarmed, dashed out the front door only to run into the arms of two citizens who were passing.

BLOWN TO ATOMS.

Terrific Boiler Explosion in New York City.

Five persons were killed and twelve injured in a boiler explosion at 534 East Fourteenth street, New York. The greater part of the exploded boiler flew out of the building across the street and crashed through the wall of a tenement. The house was demolished. A horse that was standing in the street was struck and instantly killed. Ambulance calls went out to all the hospitals in the vicinity. There was great excitement in the neighborhood.

The building in which the explosion occurred runs along the north side of East Fourteenth street, between Avenues A and B. At the Avenue B corner it is four stories high and one hundred feet further up breaks off and becomes a three-story structure.

The engine and boiler were situated just where the three-story section begins. The explosion came with the quickness of thought and probably no one will ever know the exact cause. But few people were passing along Fourteenth Street at the time. One horse car with a solitary passenger stood in front of the building. There was a mighty roar, a crashing of falling bricks and broken timbers. Like a shot the boiler was lifted out of the stable and flew across the street. It struck the tenement directly opposite with a shock that shook the whole block. Windows were smashed everywhere in the vicinity. Screams from the scores of wounded rang out wildly. Women, with children in their arms, rushed in a frantic panic to the street car and a cloud of dust and pieces of building material shot high into the air. It was not until several minutes had gone by before any one could realize what had happened. Fireman John J. Henry was passing up the street about a block away. The shock lifted him from his feet. He turned, and seeing what had happened, sent out an alarm. Before the engines came a second alarm was sounded and then came hurry calls for ambulances by the dozen.

Men struggling with wounds that in some cases were fatal ran through the streets and dropped everywhere.

DYNAMITE.

A Ship Loaded with the Deadly Stuff Catches Fire.

A special from Santander, Spain, says: A terrible explosion occurred here in which perhaps hundreds of persons were killed. The shock was so great that the residents in the furthest parts of the city thought an earthquake had occurred, and that the place was about to be destroyed.

The ship Cabo Muchicaco, with a cargo of dynamite, was lying at a quay when, in some way not yet explained, she caught fire. A large crowd gathered in the vicinity, and the police, who were evidently unaware of the dangerous character of the ship's cargo, made no attempt to drive them away. The governor personally directed the efforts of the firemen to extinguish the flames, though he was fully aware of the danger he and the other fire-fighters were in.

While every effort was being made to quench the flames there suddenly was heard a dull roar, followed by a report that shook the city to its foundations. Every house around the quay was wrecked, their walls being blown in as though made of cardboard. The loss of life can not yet be stated with any degree of accuracy. It is known that a great many persons were injured.

The town was completely paralyzed by the disaster; and no attempt was subsequently made to extinguish the fire that was communicated to adjacent quays by flaming brands thrown by the exploding dynamite. Telegrams have been sent to Valencia, Burgos, and Valladolid asking that engines be sent on special trains to fight the fire. The horror of the disaster has rendered the people helpless. It is impossible to obtain a connected story from any one of the eye witnesses of the explosion.

THE WRATTEN FAMILY.

Murder Stone Makes Another Confession.

Washington (Ind.) special: It now appears that Stone, who was brought from Jeffersonville the other night to appear before the grand jury, stated that Charles S. McCafferty, whose wife is the heir to the Wratten estate, and Robert Swanegan are among his accomplices in the murder of the Wrattens. C. McCafferty was a son-in-law of old Mrs. Wratten and has been suspected sometime, but as there was no evidence against him he was never arrested. Swanegan lives on the adjoining farm to the Wrattens and formerly kept the City Hotel. Nothing is known against him. This makes eight men Stone, in three different confessions, accused of complicity in this murder. When Stone left in charge of Sheriff Leming to be returned to Jeffersonville, people here had just learned of his presence and about the time the train pulled out crowds could be seen coming from all directions. Stone seemed anxious that the train should start and it was with a sigh of relief that the outskirts of the city were reached. He did not want to be brought here, as he very much feared the peoole's vengeance.

Train Robbers Captured.

Knoxville (Tenn.) special: An attempt was made to rob the through night express train leaving at 8:10 p. m. for Louisville, Ky., over the Knoxville and Ohio Railroad. The train stopped at a water tank near Coal Creek, thirty miles north of here and two men boarded the express car. They had no sooner entered the car than several men opened fire on them. One of them, who has been since identified as James Smith of this city, was shot through the body and mortally wounded. The other, whose name has not been learned, was captured without injury. There was less than a hundred dollars in the express car safe and the company had ten armed men aboard.

The Screen Law Void.

Indianapolis special: The city authorities of Greencastle passed a saloon-screen ordinance a year ago and endeavored to enforce it. The law required that saloons should be operated without blinds to the windows or obstructions that would prevent the police from seeing the patrons at the bar. James E. Champer was fined by the Mayor on the charge of violating the ordinance. He appealed and the case was carried through the Putnam Circuit Court, where the decision was in favor of the city, sustaining the ordinance.

The Supreme Court has reversed the decision. The opinion was by Judge McCabe. The Judge holds that where municipal corporations pass ordinances, the laws must be reasonable. The use of blinds, shutters, colored glass, and screens in business houses and dwellings is one of the conveniences of civilized life. The Judge hold that they are almost as necessary as the houses themselves. These are permitted in other business houses. Judge McCabe holds that a saloon is a legitimate business, and that it is not necessary to violate the law to make it profitable. The ordinance is declared void. The decision affects several towns of the State.

The Midway Quarrel.

Chicago special: The biggest damage suit which the Exposition corporation will be called on to defend will be commenced soon by the Ferris Wheel Company, as a result of closing the Midway Plaisance to visitors. High fences bar all the entrances to everybody except pass holders, but the wheel is kept in motion day and night and illuminated with thousands of incandescent lights as usual. "We shall keep the wheel running day and night and illuminate as usual," said Superintendent Rice, "until November 20, so as to have as strong a case as possible when our suit for damages is heard."

Buried Alive.

A sewer accident, resulting in the death of Albert Blint, a laborer, and the probable fatal injury to William Freitag, occurred in the excavation of a sanitary sewer at Dayton, Ohio. The two men were at the bottom of the trench and in a stooping posture, when the sides of the sewer suddenly caved in. Blint fell with his face against a water-pipe and with the handle of the pick pressed against his breast. In this position he was covered with tons of earth. When extricated he was dead. Freitag managed to keep his head above the earth, and escaped with broken limbs.

Spilled Into the Sea.

New York special: A party of twenty-two workmen who had been all the week employed in making repairs on Hoffman Island, in the lower bay, were on their way to the Staten Island shore when the sail boat in which they were seated was swamped and capsized. All were thrown into the water. Thirteen of them were picked up by tugs. The others were drowned. The body of one of the unfortunates was recovered an hour after the accident occurred.

A Fiend Assaults a Babe.

Saginaw (Mich.) special: An unknown man entered the home of Patrick McGuire, near this city, took a 4-year-old daughter from bed and criminally assaulted her, then escaped to the woods. The child will die. The parents of the child were across the road at a dance at the time. The excitement is intense. An armed posse is scouring the woods, and the man will be shot on sight.

Killed by Dynamite.

Chicago special: Dominick Farina was killed by an explosion of dynamite, used for blasting in Rice's stone quarry. Toney Calling and Michael Prelt were injured so badly that they will die. The men were blasting, and Farina had just plied a dynamite cartridge in the rock when it exploded prematurely. All of the men were frightfully mangled.

Our Ex-Vice President.

Paris special: Levi P. Morton has returned to Paris from Tours, where he placed his two daughters in a convent to obtain a French education. Mr. Morton is about to undergo an operation for an abscess in the foot, which the celebrated French doctor, M. Labbe, will perform.

Attempted Train Robbery.

Omaha special: Word has just been received in this city from Nebraska City that an attempt was made to hold up a Missouri Pacific train at Union, Neb. The trainmen fired at the robbers, who were colored, and drove them off.

The Doctor Was Away.

During the absence of Dr. C. D. Watkins from his home at Etna, Ohio, his house caught fire and was burned to the ground with all the contents. The wife and hired girl barely escaped. Nothing was saved.

A Crank Assaults a Priest.

Father Sullivan of St. Columbia Church, Louisville, Ky., was assaulted in his study by Nick Trainor, a worthless crank. The priest's nose was broken and his face cut. Trainor is under arrest.

Killed in a Foot-Ball Team.

In a game of foot-ball at Delavan, Wis., between Beloit College and the Deaf and Dumb Institute, a mute named Peterson was instantly killed by having his neck broken by a fall in a tackle.

Torn to Pieces.

Hiram Compton, aged 40, a brakeman on the C. and O., was run over at Mandy Furnace, just opposite Ironton, Ohio, having his head cut in two and his head and legs torn from his body.

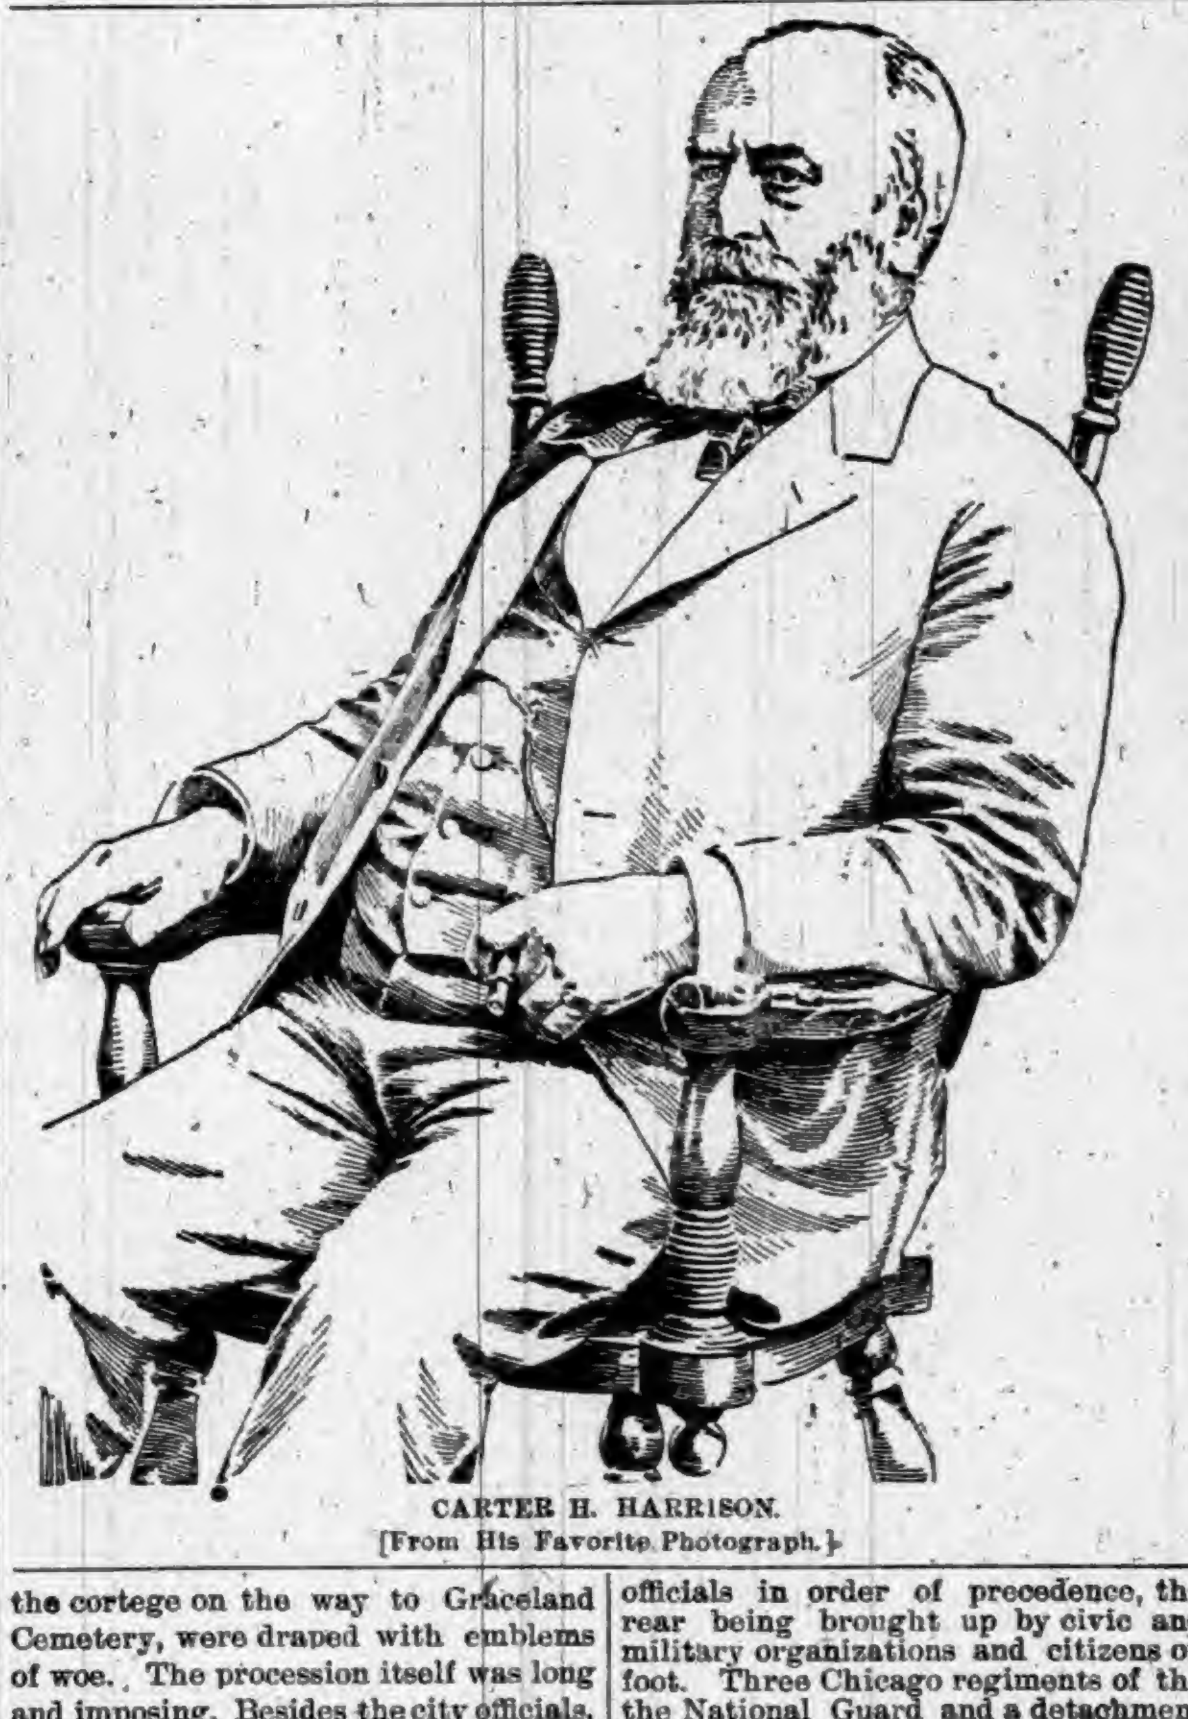
PARADE OF THE DEAD.

A MOST IMPOSING FUNERAL CORTEGE.

Military and Civic Organizations and Throngs of Citizens—Crowds So Dense as to Block the Passage of the Procession for Hours—Services Conducted in the Church of the Epiphany—Most Impressive Ceremonies Ever Accorded a Civilian—Beautiful Music and Flowers—Burial at Graceland.



CARTER H. HARRISON.
[From His Favorite Photograph.]

With all the manifestations of sorrow and regret that could be shown by a great city to its murdered executive, the remains of Carter H. Harrison were borne on Wednesday to the beautiful city of the dead on the northern outskirts of Chicago. By general consent, although there was no one in authority to issue the necessary proclamation, business throughout city was generally suspended. The city and county offices were closed throughout the day, and the public buildings, as well as scores of business houses and private residences along the route traversed by the cortege on the way to Graceland Cemetery, were draped with emblems of woe. The procession itself was long and imposing. Besides the city officials, the members of the City Council, the Board of Education and other municipal bodies, the thousands of personal friends of the dead Mayor and many civic, fraternal and semi-military bodies appeared in line. Nothing was lacking to give pomp, ceremony and impressiveness to the obsequies of the man for whom not only Chicago, but tens of thousands scattered far and wide, were in mourning.

Tuesday morning at ten o'clock the casket containing the remains was conveyed under escort from the family residence on Ashland boulevard to the City Hall. The casket was met at the La Salle street entrance of the public building by the members of the City Council. These, walking two and two, preceded it through the corridors to the center of the rotunda on the main floor, where it was placed on a magnificent catafalque. Here, beneath a canopy of black, surrounded by fragrant flowers; above, a many-tapered chandelier, the light filtering down on the peaceful face through garlands of smilax and roses, lay the mortal remains of Carter H. Harrison, and past his bier filed for hours two lines of his mourning fellow-citizens, at the rate of 5,000 per hour.

Miles of Mourners.

At 10 o'clock Wednesday morning the doors were closed against the throng that still filed through the building and the casket under the escort of the same committee selected for service the day before was returned to the house on Ashland avenue. Here, for the brief space of half an hour, the members of the bereaved family were left alone with their honored dead. In the meantime the funeral procession formed on the boulevard fronting the residence, and at the hour of noon the casket was borne for the last time down the graveled walk so often traversed by the dead man in the score or more of years that the mansion has been his home. Then the cortege, several miles in length, began to move to the Church of the Epiphany, at Ashland avenue and Adams street.

At its head, mounted on coal black chargers, rode Superintendent of Police Brennan, the marshal of the day; ex-Chief of Police Doyle, as assistant marshal, and Police Inspectors Hunt, Schaack, Ross and Lewis. Next in line came five carriages, occupied by the gentlemen who had been requested by the family to act as honorary pall bearers. This is the list: Thomas W. Palmer, Harlow N. Higinbotham, Major General Nelson A. Miles, ex-Governor Richard J. Oglesby, Ferd W. Peck, Judge Lyman Trumbull, Fred H. Winston, Gen. Charles Fitz-Simons, H. J. Jones, C. C. Billings, Adolph Kraus, Philip D. Armour, Frank Wenter, ex-Mayor John A. Roche, ex-Mayor Joseph Medill, ex-Mayor Hempstead Washburne, Judges Francis Adams, B. D. Magruder, S. P. McConnell and R. A. Waller

A carriage containing the officiating clergyman preceded the hearse. Eight active pallbearers, police captains and fire marshals, marched on each side of the funeral carriage, and the Chicago Hussars, under Captain Brand, rode in double column on the outside of the pallbearers. Following the hearse were carriages containing the immediate relatives, the City Council and officials, county, State and national officials in order of precedence, the rear being brought up by civic and military organizations and citizens on foot. Three Chicago regiments of the National Guard and a detachment of United States troops participated in the procession. Slowly the cortege proceeded down the boulevard to the church. When the arched entrance was reached the casket was borne up the aisle to the sanctuary railing by the pallbearers. The funeral service was conducted after the regular form of the Episcopal Church, Rev. T. N. Morrison, Jr., being the officiating clergyman. He also delivered a brief address. After the benediction had been pronounced the procession reformed, and headed by the Iowa State Band, took up the march of the dead to Graceland cemetery.

The crowd along the road to Graceland was as great as in the central portion of the city. No such outpouring of the public has been seen in Chicago.

REPEAL BILL A LAW.

Voorhees Measure Signed by the President.

FIGHT IS AT AN END.

Closing Scenes in the House Were Quiet.

House Concurs in the Senate Bill for Unconditional Repeal by Vote of 193 to 94—President Cleveland Puts the Finishing Touch on the Measure That Has Been So Long Before Congress—Text of the Voorhees Substitute for the Wilson Bill as Enacted.

The unconditional repeal bill is now the law of the land. Since Aug. 7 Congress has been in extra session, and in all that time it had been trying to pass a bill repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman silver law. Wednesday it succeeded, and the Voorhees bill, which was substituted by the Senate for the House measure, is now a law. The measure which has engrossed the attention of Congress and the entire country for the last three months reached its last legislative stage early in the afternoon when the House of Representatives concurred in the Senate amendment by the decisive vote of 193 to 94. When the original bill passed the House Aug. 28 the vote stood 201 to 100, so that, although the total vote on Wednesday was smaller, the proportion was practically the same.

The final vote was taken at 2:50 p. m. The bill was engrossed immediately, and twenty minutes later, at 3:10, the formal announcement was made to the Senate that its amendment had been agreed to by the House. The bill was hurriedly enrolled by Chairman Pearson of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and at 3:30 was presented to Speaker Crisp for his signature. A fleet-footed messenger carried it to the Senate, where it was signed two minutes later by Vice President Stevenson. Chairman Pearson, with the bill under his arm, entered a carriage waiting for him on the plaza in front of the Capitol and drove rapidly to the White House.

Signed by the President.

The President had been kept duly advised of the progress of events. Indeed, he manifested so much interest in the vote in the House that at his request a duplicate of the names of those who had voted for and against the concurrence was made soon after the roll-call was completed and this list was lying on his desk when Mr. Pearson arrived with the bill. Secretary Carlisle, Attorney General Olney and Private Secretary Thurber were present. After felicitating with each other for a few moments the President took up the engrossed copy of the bill and read it aloud. Then picking up a quill pen he affixed his autograph at 4:25. And thus eighty-five days four hours and twenty-five minutes after the extraordinary session convened the remedy for the financial distress which Mr. Cleveland demanded in his message was applied, and the greatest parliamentary struggle ever known was ended. The bill as passed is as follows:

> That so much of the act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and issue of Treasury notes thereon and for other purposes," and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered in each month at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371 25-100 grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment for such purchases treasury notes of the United States, be and the same is hereby repealed. And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of parity in value of coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts.

High Art.

In a decorative age all sorts of things become decorative. The Detroit Free Press reports that a colored man went into a grocery in that city not long ago, and asked the proprietor if he had any burlap lying about the shop.

"Yes," said the grocer, "I've got a few coffee sacks, but they are old and in pretty bad shape."

"Dat's all de better, sah. I want 'bout four of 'em."

The grocer brought them out, and the negro looked round the shop.

"Has you any pieces of rope to spare?" he asked. "I want about fifty feet."

A tangled lot of old cord and rope was handed to him.

"Going to pack something for moving?" asked the grocer.

"No, sah. My wife was workin' fer a lady on High street de odder day, an' she cotched on to a new idea. She's gwine to use dis stuff, 'long wid a few suspender buckles an' shoe-strings, to make a pianer-kiver."

"Land! but what a cover that will make!"

"Dat's what I done tole her, but she brung home all de perticklers in her mind, an' she's boun' to turn one out. If you h'ar of anybody as wants a twenty-five-dollar pianer-kiver, home-made an' chuck full of art, jes' le' me know."

between the hours of 10 o'clock a. m., and 4 o'clock p. m. of said day, at the door of the court house of DeKalb county, Indiana, the rents and profits for a term not exceeding seven years of the following real estate, to wit.

Begining at the northwest corner of lot number twenty-four (24) in block number twenty-one (21) in the town of Ashley, DeKalb county, state of Indiana, running thence east sixty-five (65) feet, thence south forty (40) feet, thence west sixty-five (65) feet, thence north forty (40) feet to the place of beginning, and a two story building erected thereon, situated in the town of Ashley, DeKalb county state of Indiana.

"The General is sure to return to England, and when he does that young lady will create a furor. If I, for instance, had any idea of asking her to marry me, I should do so at once." And Major St. John looked curiously at the calm, handsome face.

"That would doubtless prove a wise precaution," said the Captain, carelessly; "I am not a great believer in the felicity of either love or marriage."

"Then you are no soldier," was the quick reply; "next to glory a soldier values love."

"It may be that I have had no actual experience," laughed Paul Flemyng. "I have imagined to myself a kind of ideal woman, but I have never met any one like her."

"That's all very well. I prefer the real myself," returned the Major, dryly. "I should have imagined, for example, that la belle Ethel was infinitely superior to any ideal that you or I could imagine."

"She is a beautiful girl."

"She is more than that," remarked the Major. "I can read passion, genius, fire, power, in her face. Do you know," questioned he, abruptly, "I fancied there was some little tenderness between you and Miss Dacre?"

"I never care to discuss such matters," said Paul, calmly.

"That is so say, you will not boast of 'good fortune.'"

"I have none to boast of, and if I had there is honor in love, I suppose, as well as in warfare."

"We all noticed Miss Dacre's bouquet of white rosebuds," continued Major St. John, "and we could not help seeing that when you left the ball-room you carried one of them in your coat."

"There is nothing in that. Miss Dacre gave it to me because I admired them."

"Young ladies do not give rosebuds for nothing," said the Major laughing. "I consider it a most suspicious circumstance."

To this Captain Flemyng made no reply.

"You will call at the General's sometime to-day?" said Major St. John.

"Yes. I told my servant to follow me here first with the papers and letters from the mail."

"Then you will not tell me anything about Miss Dacre, Paul?"

"I have nothing to tell, except that I think her very beautiful, and of an amiable disposition. How nicely she speaks to her father and how kind she is to every one! Ah, here comes the letters!"

There were several letters and papers. Captain Flemyng gave the papers to his friend, while he read the closely written pages of his English correspondence. He came at length to a blue, official-looking envelope, and Major St. John, instead of reading the news, looked at him while he opened it.

The letter was of great moment to the young soldier. It was to tell him whether he was Lord Charnleigh, of Crown Leighton, a peer of the realm, with a vast fortune at his command; or whether he was to remain Captain Flemyng, with nothing save his undaunted bravery and his noble heart. Yet his hands did not tremble as he broke the seal, his face neither flushed nor grew pale with emotion—he was calm and collected; and the Major, a brave man himself, did silent homage to his comrade's self-command. Paul Flemyng read the letter through, then laid it aside, and calmly opened the rest. Nothing could be gathered from his face—there was neither great elation nor disappointment in it.

"What news?" asked the Major, curiously, unable to bear the suspense any longer.

"I was just going to tell you. For a lawyer's letter, this is really romantic. The true heir is found, and, to use a Hibernicism, she is an heiress. There will be no Earl of Charnleigh, but a countess. It is quite a romance. Even Mr. Clements seems touched by it; he says there is not the least doubt as to perfect legality of the young lady's claims. The court has passed judgment in her favor. No will can be found, and she is the nearest of kin. He adds that she is young, exceedingly lovely, and has led a most retired life."

"Who was she?" asked the major.

"That he does not say; but, to give her her full title, she is now Leonie, Countess of Charnleigh and Baroness Fieldsaye."

"What a position for a young girl!" exclaimed the Major. "I cannot help wishing, Paul, that the great prize had been yours."

"I resign it cheerfully," he returned. "I should have liked it, but it is hers, and I would not take it from her if I could, Heaven knows. She is welcome to it. See—I part with my hopes as easily as I part with this." And Captain Paul Flemyng, as he spoke, tore a piece of paper into shreds and threw them away.

"You are a hero. If I had just lost a peerage, I should be in a most un-Christian frame of mind with the whole world. I can admire your heroism, but cannot imitate it. Do you know what I should do if I were in your place, mon brave sabreur?"

"No: I cannot even guess."

"I should get leave of absence, go home to England, woo, win, and marry the countess."

"All young ladies are not so willing to be married," said Captain Flemyng. "But I must go now, Major: it is time I paid my visit to the General. Will you accompany me?"

"No, I feel that I should be de trop. I shall see you this evening."

And the two, without more words, parted after the fashion of Englishmen, although Major St. John had such a warm affection for his friend that he could have wept like a woman over his disappointment.

CHAPTER X.

Meanwhile Captain Paul Flemyng walked on. He would not admit that he was disappointed; he said to himself that a soldier must bear the buffets of fortune as he bears the blows of the enemy, without flinching. As he walked on beneath the sapphire sky, the sun pouring down golden floods of light upon him, he thought much of the lovely young countess who was now mistress of Crown Leighton. He repeated her name to himself.

CORRESPONDENCE

WATERLOO.

Mrs. Frank Long, from California, is here for an extended visit with her relatives and friends.

Mrs. Nichols, who has been ill all summer, is now very sick. Her mother and sister from Michigan are here to care for her.

John Fisher and wife, of Ft Wayne, spent fair week in Waterloo visiting relatives and attending the fair. Mrs Fisher has quite recently returned from California where she went to spend some time with her parents and her sister, Mrs. Frank Long, who resides in the golden state.

Miss Allie Phillips has returned from her second visit to the world's fair. Her ticket did not expire until Oct. 17, but having taken a bad cold from which she was suffering severely, she came three days earlier. She has been quite sick since, having had regular croup, and later, scarlet rash.

The little house on wheels in which the wooly headed girl was exhibited, was established on Wayne street until after the reunion occurred. From the number of people seen to enter their receipts must have amounted to quite a sum. There were other strangers here also during Wednesday, with different ways to draw a crowd with the one object to laughingly. "I called to thank you for one of the happiest evenings I have ever spent, Miss Dacre."

"You owe me little gratitude, Captain Flemyng; the ball was papa's idea, not mine. Will you come out here on to the balcony? It is so much pleasanter than in the warm room. I think July is a month that tries one's temper severely."

"I do not think you have any temper to try," he remarked, pushing back the roses while he found a place by her side.

She looked at him with flashing eyes.

"You are mistaken, Captain Flemyng. A man's idea of feminine excellence is always inanity. Now, do believe me, a woman without a temper would be simply insipid and unbearable."

He laughed at her earnest, vehement words.

"You must allow one thing—even if she has a little spice of temper, she must not show it."

"I shall not agree even to that," she replied. "What would tire any one more than a continual diet of sugar?"

He smiled to himself, wondering if the young Countess in far-off England was of the same opinion, and she, looking up at him suddenly, caught the smile. He had not noticed that while she spoke to him her beautiful face turned shyly away; he never saw how the white hands trembled and the dark eyes dropped, so he did not read their secret. He was blind to all thse signs, that would have been so well understood by a man of greater vanity. She caught the smile, and hastened to change the subject.

"Captain Flemyng," she said, "I wonder if I may ask you a question?"

"You will do me honor," he replied.

"I know the English mail was in today, and—pray, pardon me—I heard papa talking about you to my aunt. Shall you think me very inquisitive if I ask you whether the Charnleigh case is settled?"

Looking at her lovely face, and the clear, true eyes bent so kindly upon him, the impulse came to him to tell her the whole truth. She listened, even as he read his letters, with a calm face; but when his story was ended, there was little of calm in the flushed face and trembling lips.

"Then you have lost entirely," she said; "there is no chance for you?"

"None at all," he answered; "the affair is finally settled."

"And you knew that only two hours since, when the mail came in?"

"I received my letters and learned my fate then," he replied.

"Yet, with that knowledgde, you could come here calmly to fulfill a trifling social duty, and never once mention what must have lain heavily on your heart!"

"I assure you," he explained, earnestly, "that since I have stood in this balcony until you asked me about it, I have never given it one thought."

She was to be forgiven if she misunderstood him; her lovely face flushed and her eyes dropped with a glad, happy look which she did not seek to repress.

So the sweet, fragrant sunshiny hours passed while the two conversed among the flowers. To the young girl these hours seemed stolen from paradise, they were so full of happiness; they flew like golden moments; she could hardly realize that they were ended when Captain Flemyng said that he must go.

He held the little white hand in his for ons minute, then he was gone; and to the girl it seemed as if all the sunshine, the fragrance, and the beauty had gone with him. He had been standing with one had lying lightly on the iron railing; when he was gone, she stooped down and kissed the place where his hand had lain, and then a hot blush burned her face.

"I would I were a queen," she said, "that I might give him all the riches that would be mine. I wish I had the largest fortune ever given to woman that I might share it with him."

CHAPTER XI.

Captain Paul Flemying never spoke of his disappointment; he had not mentioned his expectations, but every one knew from the papers what they were. But one feeling was general, and that was universal admiration of the coolness, the courage, the grace with which he bore what to most men would have seemed an almost unbearable disappointment. No one admired his cool, calm courage more than Ethel Dacre.

"If ever we go to London," she said to Captain Flemyng, one day, "I shall hope to see your beautiful young countess. Have you ever seen her yourself?"

"No," he replied; "to tell you a still more startling truth, I do not know of her existence. I shall not be sorry when leave of absence comes, so that I may go home; then I shall see her."

"You will be sure to like her very much," said Ethel, with a sigh.

"She is the head of the family; I must look up to her as 'chieftainess' of a great race."

He did not understand the wistful look she gave him.

"You will think her very beautiful, without doubt, Captain Flemyng."

"Lawyers are given neither to romance nor to exaggeration, and Mr. Clements tells me she is lovely."

"You will be sure to think her the very nicest girl you ever saw."

He looked up with an amused smile.

"I cannot tell, Miss Dacre; I will let you know if the matter interests you."

"Of course it interests me," she replied, turning away with something like faint envy of the young countess.

Yet he did not understand—granite itself was not colder or harder, not more insensible than he.

Meanwhile Leonie, Countess of Charnleigh, was learning to fulfill all the duties of her station.

Crown Leighton had in former times been justly celebrated for its magnificent hospitalities. Lady Charnleigh was very anxious to resume them.

"Imagine a fete in these grounds!" she said, with the ardor of one of whom all such things were new. "Imagine colored lamps amid these trees, fountains scattering silver spray high in the perfumed air, and music floating over the trees and flowers—ladies in jewels bright as the stars in the sky! Oh, carry none but a first-class line of goods. The COURIER bespeaks for him prosperity for him in his new undertaking.

"Oh, auntie," she cried, "I wish it were May! You said we should go to London in May; I am counting the hours."

"You are to be presented in May, Leonie," returned the elder lady; "so we must decide soon upon your court dress. Of course you will wear the Charnleigh diamonds."

There came to the young girl, who had been reared in the midst of poverty and privation, a kind of wonder as to whether this was all a dream—whether she would wake up suddenly and laugh at her own folly. Lady Fanshawe looked at the brilliant face.

"Leonie," she said, suddenly, "you ought to marry well—you are sure to marry well."

A low ripple of laughter came from Lady Charnleigh, as she looked up with the frank, sweet smile that characterized her.

"Marry!" she said; "why, what can marriage give me?"

Lady Fanshawe made no reply.

"I have wealth," continued the girl, "jewels, rank—what more does life require to make it happy?"

"You will find out some day—that is, if you are of the same nature as other girls. I am not romantic, nor do I teach romance, but at your age I should have thought that love would take precedence of all."

"Perhaps it might if I knew anything at all about it; but Miss Templeton did not allow such a thing to be mentioned. Any young lady found guilty of receiving a love letter would have been severely punished."

"Miss Templeton acted rightly," said Lady Fanshawe; "girls at school have no business to think of such a thing."

"Of course," continued Leonie; with an air of charming candor, "we were allowed to talk as much as we liked about money; so that I understand that better than love."

But in the eyes of Leonie, Lady Charnleigh, as she spoke, there was something that belied her words.

OLD VIRGINIA.

Queer Customs Existing in That Conservative State.

A curious custom existing in conservative Virginia is that of considering it impolite to drive past another carriage on the road and going in the same direction. True it is, some iconoclasts and outsiders drive past their fellow travelers without compunction, but they, therefore, prove their claim to be called iconoclasts and outsiders. When it is a very pressing case, an apology is called out, such as, "Pray excuse me, but my horse is restless," or "I am in haste to catch the boat," or something of the kind. But to drive ruthlessly ahead without a word of apology is considered the acme of ill breeding.

The reads in Virginia are not interesting, except for their natural beauty, as the people of wealth, following their English ancestors in practice, seek a proud seclusion for their houses. Only the poorest people build their houses on the main road, and one may travel from one end of the country to another and not find a single handsome residence on the public highway. There was in early times another and a very practical reason for abjuring the public highway. Every man's house was at the service of every man, woman and child in the country; an Arab hospitality obtained and was enjoyed to the full. The people who had undesirable homes were always willing to bestow their company upon their more fortunate neighbors, so that it wouldn't do to be too convenient to the main arteries of travel. Especially was this so when a visit from a family meant the entertaining of two coach horses, a coachman, and a maid: for the negroes went visiting with the white people, and enjoyed it quite as much. Hospitality was one of their great virtues, and is still; for these people excel in social virtues, and this particular virtue costs little. It only meant the killing of half a dozen more chickens for dinner, when there are hundreds, perhaps, scratching about the poultry yard; and the gardens were overgrown with vegetables, for which there was neither sale or consumption.

A Queer Thing About Camels.

Some years ago, when the British troops were fighting against the forces of the Mahdi in the Soudan, oppportunity was afforded to many of the correspondents accompanying the expedition to study the habits of the camel. Most of the transportation of the soldiers' baggage was done by these "ships of the desert," as they are called, and at night some of the newspaper men spent a portion of their leasure trying to learn something new about these strange creatures.

One of them, who was an inveterate smoker, discovered that the camel is a great lover of tobacco. Let any one smoke a pipe or cigar in the camel compound, said he, and the camel will follow the smoker about, place his nose close to the burning tobacco, inhale the fumes with a prolonged sniff, swallow the smoke, then throwing his head up, with mouth agape and eyes upturned, showing the bloodshot whites, will grunt a sigh of ecstasy that would make the fortune of a low comedian in a love scene.

So if any of you have a pet camel who seems to be longing for something and refuses to be comforted until he gets it, you might give him a cigar. He is usually so intelligent that it would probably take very few lessons to teach him how to smoke in a most expert fashion.—Harper's Young People.

GERMAN BUILDING.

This is at the north end and near the lake and is a fine substantial structure, painted outside so as to show decorations in colors, giving it a very artistic appearance. Within is a wilderness of fine work of all sorts, in iron, wood, cloths, pictures, wax figures and the like, as well as very elaborate educational or school work. It is a study of many hours. Near by is

THE SPANISH BUILDING.

It is filled with many fine and costly works of art, including some very valuable old pictures—quite large, some of them, and generally belonging to the age of Spain that was much more brilliant than its present—when the discoveries of Columbus and other explorers had made Spain one of the foremost nations of the earth. There were many photos of views in Spanish cities and country scenes, as well as photos of eminent persons. It looked, though, as if Spain had revived for a brief time long enough to call our attention to her departed glories.

THE BRAZIL BUILDING.

Our new South American sister republic makes a grand showing with a large, lovely building whose interior decoration is as beautiful as its exterior is imposing. Naturally enough the interior is filled all over with her leading products, coffee and cacao beans. The coffee is everywhere and in every shape and condition. It is too common to need description. The grand rooms of this building show partly the design of the palace of their emperors, or as now, the parliament house of the republic. There are fine, large oil paintings of scenes in the early and in the later history of their country. Among them is "The First Mass," the first one celebrated in Brazil. The priests have erected a rough cross in the woods and all around them are gathered the wondering natives. It is a grand picture. Another large one shows the court of Dom Pedro, with himself and empress seated on thrones, and the impressive ceremony of "Kiss-

She was not satisfied with the answer and held him fast. "I can't see you, but I must know who you are! What is your name?"

He turned quickly away in the darkness, and still remains unknown. Yet he knew that she had great wealth, and would probably reward most generously the man who had saved her child.

Many good men have accepted fame and fortune as the reward of noble actions. But there is something in the choice of this poor hotel servant, to let the secret knowledge of his unselfish deed in his own heart be his own reward, which comes as an inspiration into our commonplace lives.

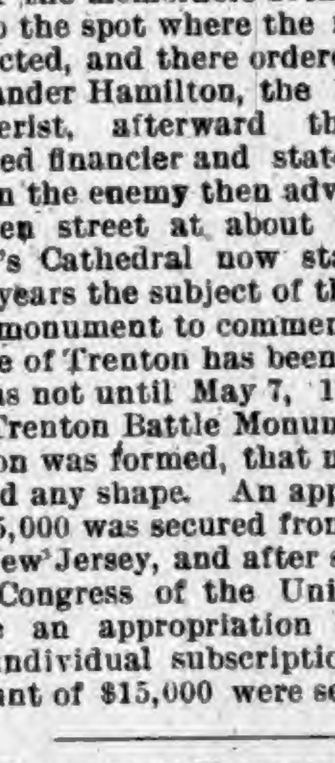
The late Prince Consort of England once said: "The man who embodies to me most strongly the idea of integrity is a poor Highland gamekeeper. If I ever did a dishonorable action I should not meet Davy's eye. He would know it."

Some of our readers may occupy positions as humble as that of the bell-boy or the poor Highlander, and sometimes, perhaps, revolt against their lot. They should remember that God, now as in the days of David, often chooses a poor lad to anoint him and make him a king among men.

BATTLE OF TRENTON.

Fitting Monument to Commemorate Washington's Victory.

The recent dedication of the monument in the city of Trenton, N. J., to commemorate the great victory won there by George Washington on Dec. 26, 1776, was an event of national interest. President Cleveland formally dedicated the monument to the admiration of the present generation and posterity in general. Governor Flower and staff attended the ceremonies, and the West Point cadets added splendor to the great military display made. New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut and Pennsylvania paraded the flower of their national guard, and fifteen Governors and their colonels, together with cabinet officers and many prominent men, joined in the historical festivities.



TRENTON MONUMENT.

The shaft, costing $60,000, commemorates the battle of Trenton, which occurred after the stirring scenes in and about New York. Washington is represented in the statue as he appeared when he came down Pennington road on the morning of the memorable 26th of December to the spot where the monument is erected, and there ordered Captain Alexander Hamilton, the 19-year-old artillerist, afterward the distinguished financier and statesman, to fire on the enemy then advancing up Warren street at about where St. Mary's Cathedral now stands. For fifty years the subject of the erection of a monument to commemorate the battle of Trenton has been discussed. It was not until May 7, 1884, when the Trenton Battle Monument Association was formed, that matters assumed any shape. An appropriation of $15,000 was secured from the State of New Jersey, and after some delay the Congress of the United States made an appropriation of $30,000, and individual subscriptions to the amount of $15,000 were secured.

Portuguese Characteristics.

The men of Portugal are as fond of show as are the women. Their fingers are nearly always loaded with rings, and about their bodies hang chains as thick as ropes, from which are suspended bunches of trinkets.

The Portuguese dandy is fond of anything that draws attention to his much-esteemed person. Above his showy vest he wears a cravat of rich colors, and in his buttonhole a full-blown rose. I know I am safe in saying that most of the promenaders whom I have seen on Sundays in the chief thoroughfares with riding whips in their hands and handsome spurs on their heels have never set foot in a stirrup. The spur is to them a sort of sign of nobility which they arrogate to themselves, a relic of the privileges of the old chivalry. Where is the Portuguese, be he muleteer or calker, whose ancestors did not wear golden spurs at the battle of Ourique or of Aljubarrota? I have noticed that a good many officials work in spurs as if about to go to battle, and when these knights of the quill peacefully render up their fine, bureaucratic souls to God, I have no doubt that their spurs will be laid on their tombs.

But have we any right to dwell so long in a half mocking spirit on a people of such numerous and trustworthy moral qualities, and who, but for their unfortunate indolence and their exaggerated egotism, might be held up as a model to other nations? For the Portuguese are naturally good, hospitable, honest in their dealings, generous and brave, and we are very certain that in the event of

A STRANGE CASE.

How an Enemy was Foiled.

The following graphic statement will be read with intense interest: "I cannot describe the numb, creepy sensation that existed in my arms, hands and legs. I had to rub and beat those parts until they were sore, to overcome in a measure the dead feeling that had taken possession of them. In addition, I had a strange weakness in my back and around my waist, together with an indescribable 'gone' feeling in my stomach. Physicians said it was creeping paralysis, from which, according to their universal conclusion, there is no relief. Once it fastens upon a person, they say, it continues its insidious progress until it reaches a vital point and the sufferer dies. Such was my prospect. I had been doctoring a year and a half steadily, but with no particular benefit, when I saw an advertisement of Dr Miles' Restorative Nervine, procured a bottle and began using it. Marvelous as it may seem, but a few days had passed before every bit of that creepy feeling had left me, and there has not been even the slightest indication of its return. I now feel as well as I ever did, and have gained ten pounds in weight, though I had run down from 170 to 137. Four others have used Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine on my recomendation, and it has been as satisfactory in their cases as in mine."—James Kane, La Rue, O.

This curiosity is of colossal size, but perfectly proportioned. It is about sixty feet high and is very white and smooth. There are very few fissures on the surface, and they, strangely, are in the proper places to form features. The only real projection from the surface is exactly placed for an eyebrow. The two humps are plainly to be seen, and the neck is curved beautifully. The rock is really a solid piece rising from the ground, but the effect of legs is produced by a clump of dark-colored brush that grows beside the stone. The white stone shows plainly at both sides of the brush, and the effect of legs is unmistakably produced. The strangest part of it is that it looks like a camel from all sides and at all times of the day or night. There is no disguising the resemblance. How the rock got into its present shape is one of the great mysteries of nature.

WIDELY KNOWN IN THE SOUTH.

Governor Northen, to Whom President Cleveland Wrote a Famous Letter.

One of the most prominent of the group of Southern Governors is William J. Northen, of Georgia, the "Ohio of the South." For many years he has been well and widely known in the Southern States, says the Tammany Times, and since his election in 1890 to the highest office within the gift of his State he has become a national figure. A large part of his early career was spent as an instructor in the school-room, and the training he there acquired made him especially acute in his estimates of public feeling. The incident which has lately brought him into such universal public notice was the correspondence between him and President Cleveland on the silver question, a part of which has been made public.

Self-Control.

It is interesting, when one has had his attention called particularly to the fact, to note how often a peculiar attraction of manner which we admire in some one of our friends is identical with or dependent upon a certain sense of well-being which is the outcome of a condition of perfect self-control. And were it not incumbent upon us by the laws of society, we should do well, out of regard to our health, to place our bodies under the strict discipline of our wills.

It is instructive in connection with this subject to notice how completely the body and its various functions may be brought under command of the will by those who will exercise the requisite patience. Muscles may be brought into action which were before unrecognized. Even the vital functions of the body may be affected. There have been not a few exhibitors who could actually control the heart-beat, making their pulses noticeably slower or faster according to their pleasure.

The seemingly miraculous feats of acrobats are simply the result of continually placing particular sets of muscles under complete control of the will.

And if we were disposed to profit by our investigations, we should do well to try and appreciate how important, to our physical being at least, the gaining of a complete control over our bodies may be.

The student who has before him a difficult passage or problem must, if he would succeed, exercise sufficient will-force to place everything else in his mind second to the task before him.

It is much the same in our daily life. Multitudes of petty things tend to make us forget our purpose in living, and if we are to rise above them, we must remember to unburden our minds of the "worries" that we may have room for the "realities." We must shun excitement of every kind. We must live an even, temperate life; and we can do this easily enough if we have gained perfect control over ourselves.—Youth's Companion.

His Red Comb.

Since the present manager of the Albion Democrat took hold of that once respectable paper, he seems to have permitted himself to be possessed of the idea that he, in some way, was responsible for the management—especially the editorial management—of about all the papers in this district. With this great burden on his mind, he at once placed a ridiculously little chip on his shoulder in the evident hope that other publishers would be rushing pell mell over one another for the doubtful privilege of knocking it off. But the chip staid till a high wind came and blew it off. Then he ruffled up his feathers and rubbed his little red comb till it glistened, but there were few "takers." Not receiving any notice, he evidently determined to give his red comb another brush up, and do the opening himself. Last week he undertook to edit the COURIER, or rather, to indicate how the COURIER man should edit it. We wish to state to our bombastic friend, that we are capable of attending to our own duties, and have not asked advice as to how the COURIER is to be edited. He did not like our write up of the trial of Husselman. Possibly not. We did not give his opinions a thought.

We were stating the truth as a newspaper should, and with very few comments. And for these comments we offer no excuse. What we said in the main, was to repeat the testimony that was made under oath. If the parties did not swear to the truth it is no fault of the COURIER. We told what they said. True, there was a great deal sworn to at that trial that we do not believe, but we did not say so. This often happens in court matters. Then our pompous critic goes out of his way to try and get up a feeling between the editor of this paper and Judge Adair. But we probably knew Judge Adair many years before our critic knew him, and we take a second place with none in our admiration and respect for his Honor. There is not a word we said, that can be tortured into an effort to affront Judge Adair. He insists that "Judge Vail presided in a manner satisfactory to all," and this "all," we presume, must include the editor of this paper and the majority of Auburn people who agree with us. Well, if his Nibs says it is satisfactory to us, we suppose it must be so. His last bright assertion is one we cannot understand, and therefore we may not reply to it just to suit him. He says we "perhaps had an interest in the case." The only thing we can think he means here is that we may have wanted to see Hank get as big blood money as possible. But how could that be our condition? Hank wouldn't think of dividing with us. The only reason we could possibly have to see him get a large sum of money would be that he might be "staked up" long enough to give our people a rest from his oft-repeated salutation, "Say, gimme half dolla." This, we are told, he did only a few weeks ago, and we, ourself, have seen him do it several times. So that $775, representing twice as many halves, would relieve 1550 respectable citizens of Auburn of this annoyance once, or it would relieve one citizen of the annoyance 1,550 times. In either case, it might prove an advantage to Auburn. And just think, this money would secure him 7,750 whiskies straight or 15,500 beers. And as Hank swore on the stand that he was liable to take as many as 15 drinks a day, this would last him 516 days and 16 hours in whisky, or 1033 days and 8 hours in beer. And yet, while this may suit those interested in the Husselman Little case, we can't say that it interests us. So we give this last phase of the question up and leave our critic to smooth out his feathers and cool his comb.

Since writing the above we have read in the Garrett Clipper itself, an item bearing on the subject of Judge Adair's getting another man to try the Hank Little job. As already said, there was no criticism of Judge Adair in our remarks, though we think the trial would have been more fairly conducted had he been on the bench. But to show that we would have been justified in criticising Vail, we have only to take the Clipper's own statement. In all its issues since the trial, the Clipper has manifested a gratification over Vail's "throwing out evidence for Husselman." We don't know how much of the evidence Vail did throw out, but, judging from what the Clipper says, it must have been about all. And as they do not mention the throwing out of any on Hank's side, we suppose this throwing out was all against Husselman, although we heard some suspicious testimony given by Hank's men. If Hank is not lying (about which there is always a doubt), it looks as if Husselman didn't have much left to go to the jury on.

Then, as to Judge Adair, the Clipper also gives him a bad give-away. In getting in his usual fling at the Dispatch last week, he says this, which we copy word for word:

Judge Adair took us by the hand in the Albion court house and said: "I am sorry I could not get here in time to try your case." He gave us other points of interest and encouraged us by saying that we had a good jury.

We are not aware that it is particularly wrong for a judge to act and talk like this under such circumstances, but it is very unusual and very imprudent. So our Albion windjammer will see from the testimony of the one for whom he is probably undertaking this silly job, that we would have been amply justified in making all the criticisms he claims we did. If this surprising statement of the Clipper is false, Judge Adair should, in justice to himself, deny it. If it is true, we have no farther remarks.

Court.

Considerable time has been taken up arguing for and against the mortgage Samuel Deeters gave to his sister, Rebecca Emerick. As the several cases against him will take a good deal of money to pay the expenses of a defense, he evidently thought he would keep out enough for that purpose. So he gave a mortgage of $3,500 to his sister and puts the expenses of the defense into her hands. There is also a mechanic's lien of $700 on the new brick residence, making a total encumbrance of $4,200, which would make rather poor picking for parties coming in later. Judge McClellan is attorney for Mr. Yates, who asks civil damages for the injuries inflicted by Deeters' shooting, so in order to give his client some chance to get damages, Judge McClellan is fighting the mortgage to Mrs. Emerick. Her attorneys, Penfield, Croxton and Barr, wish to push the mortgage and Judge McClellan opposes. He makes a single handed fight and a strong one against three able attorneys. It gets very interesting at times, but the points have not all been decided. Another queer case has just been called up. It is the case of Mrs. Weaver against Alpheus Wheelock for the recovery of land. It appears that Wheelock has been occupying about sixteen feet of Mrs. Weaver's lot, for which he has no deed, but claims it is legally his by reason of undisturbed occupation of himself and his predecessors in the property for over 20 years. Lately Wheelock ran a fence through on what he asks to be the line, and we think this hurried on the suit.

Adolphus Widney, who stole the railroad tickets at Butler, was adjudged guilty of petit larceny and given 30 days in jail. He is probably not a dishonest or bad man, but not bright. Had he been full-witted, he could have readily sold the tickets and got a good sum of money for them. The Deeters murder case will probably be taken out of the county, but there are indications that the other cases concerning him will be tried here. All ought to be. To-day the case of Widner vs Oberholtzer will likely be tried over again, this time by Judge Woodhull. Judge Powers has tried it once. As we go to press on Wednesday afternoon, the Weaver-Wheelock trial is going on, with Woodhull as judge.

Farmers, Plant Plums.

C. P. Houser is delivering fruit trees now. We feel particularly interested in the growing of plums, which have proved such a success for the past year or two. Mr. Houser sold all his crop this year at $4 a bushel and could have sold any amount. He had two young trees that had been planted but two years and were five years only from the graft, that each bore a half bushel. He has a lot of plum trees for sale, grafted on plum stocks, which are always much better than those grafted on peach stocks, as some are. They do better, are hardier and bear better. His experience, and that of many others, is that plums are the easiest to raise and the most sure and most profitable of any fruit. They are saved by merely spraying the trees two or three times. Everyone who has the ground should raise plums.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY.

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana, post-office as second-class matter.

THURSDAY.....NOVEMBEB 9, 1893.

TUESDAY'S ELECTIONS.

A Sweeping Republican Victory in General.

REPUBLICANS CARRY THESE:

Ohio, plurality	75,000
Massachusetts	15,000
New York	40,000
Iowa	30,000
South Dakota	3,000

DEMOCRATS CARRY THESE:

Kentucky	25,000
New Jersey	2,000
Maryland	10,000
Virginia	60,000

Populists carried Kansas.

The voting was wild and we go to press too early to get accurate news. But as was expected the republicans won most of the battles. This sweeping defeat will do the democrats good. We think our members of congress will now stay at their places and do something.

SECRETARY CARLISLE is looking up a plan for reciprocity with Canada.

TRAIN ROBBERS tried to steal the Montana silver statue on its way to New York last week. They were driven off.

A STREET car in Portland, Oregon, ran into an open draw bridge last Thursday and went to the bottom of the river. Seven lives lost.

CONGRESS adjourned Friday afternoon, thus closing the special session. The regular session will begin the first Monday in December.

ABOUT 500 Brazilian soldiers were drowned last week in the great bay of Rio Janeiro. Were going across the bay when a man-of-war ran into them.

REPORTS from Oregon that the free silver business is not as popular there as has been claimed. They are more interested in tariff, and are opposed to free wool.

SENATOR PALMER of Illinois voiced the feeling of sensible people when he told the silver senators that he was ashamed to hear senators claim that England was controlling this country.

CHICAGO city roads carried an immense number of people during the six months of the fair. The Illinois Central carried 19 millions; the elevated road 22½ millions; the South Side cable system, 78 millions.

MAYOR Harrison was buried last Wednesday with imposing ceremonies and great sadness. It is estimated that nearly half a million people lined the streets through which the procession passed for many miles.

COOPER of Indiana, will introduce a bill in congress to tax greenbacks. We hope it will pass. It will save a great many otherwise honest people from the temptation to get their means into greenbacks every year about the time the assessor comes around.

WHEN congress meets in December in regular session it is sincerely to be hoped that democratic members will have the good sense to attend and stay at work. It is a disgrace to the country to see fifty or a hundred members absent, and their pay going on.

ABOUT 10,000 young babies were cared for at the Children's Building, during the six months of the fair. All were called for but one, which was left with them on Saturday of the last week. It was taken to an Orphans' Home. At the Paris exposition, a hundred or two were thus abandoned.

NEW tariff bill will likely put a great many more articles on the free list, so as to enable our manufacturers to produce goods as cheap as in England. Then our people can not only buy their clothes cheaper, but we can undersell the English in foreign markets, and yet keep more factories at work.

PUBLIC debt increasing about 5 millions a month. Tariff for protection does this, because it does not bring in as much money as a tariff for revenue. A revenue tariff is levied so as to bring in as much as possible with as little burden to the people. A tariff for protection leaves all the burden on the people, but produces less money.

THERE was an unseemly struggle in the Chicago City Hall Friday. Democrats and republicans struggled to see which should control that body. The republicans had a majority and so elected a temporary mayor to succeed Mr. Harrison. Then within twenty days there must be a special election, when the people will choose a man to serve out the unexpired time.

"GOLD has been found in Brown county Indiana," says an exchange. This veneral, but interesting item started on its annual rounds when the writer of this was a lad. It still brings pleasure for a few days, then passes off into the land of forgotten things, only to appear again bright and fresh as a daisy, a year later. It started out a little earlier than usual this year, but then we have had such a growing season.

OUR Anti bribery election law, which has been in the supreme court so long, has been decided constitutional. Now let the supreme court leave our other laws alone, and give the people, through their members of the legislature, a chance to make and enforce such laws as the people need. This is the law that gives a man $300 if he proves that it was even attempted to bribe him. Other states are now complimenting Indiana.

G. H. YESBERA,

THE LEADING CLOTHIER AND MERCHANT TAILOR,

AUBURN, INDIANA.

SANTANDER, Spain, Saturday had a terrible experience. A large ship lying at a wharf caught fire and everybody gathered near as they could to watch the sailors and firemen, not knowing she was loaded with dynamite. Suddenly she exploded and scarcely a trace of her or dock remained. About a dozen smaller vessels in the harbor were destroyed, and a large man-of-war was set on fire and lost forty men. The town was wrecked. It was probably the most dreadful explosion ever known.

CALIFORNIA will have a great mid-winter exposition at San Francisco, beginning Jan. 1. There are many large buildings, and various counties over the state will have costly buildings of their own. The other counties will make displays. Not only will the state display its general products, but a special feature will be the tropic fruits and similar productions that have become such a feature of California, especially of southern California. Of course but few people can go from this distance, but those who do will be amply repaid.

GEORGE GOULD, son and chief heir of the late Jay Gould comes out plain in favor of an income tax. He says it is the only fair way to tax the wealthy and about the only way the proper amount of taxes can be got out of them. He says the personal property tax of wealthy men, is generally evaded. He pays as much personal tax as both the head Vanderbilts. He does not think the people would like to have railroads and telegraphs owned by the government, as in such cases he had found that rates are higher and service poorer, because there is no competition. He says however, he would be willing to sell his railroad and telegraph stock to the government at any time.

REPEAL bill passed the House Wednesday of last week at 2:50 p. m., and was at once signed by the president. The vote was; Yeas, 193; nays 94, about the same vote by which the original bill had passed the House. Nine Indiana members voted for it. Mr. Conn was paired, but would have voted for it. The other three members we have not heard from. They were probably absent. The analysis of the vote shows that 124 democrats, 68 republicans and 1 populist voted for the repeal, while 70 democrats, 12 republicans and 9 populists voted against it. When it passed the senate, 20 democrats and 23 republicans voted for it, while 19 democrats, 9 republicans and 4 populists voted against it. This shows that a majority both of democrats and republicans voted for it in both houses, while all the populists in both houses, except one senator, voted against it.

Obituary.

Clarence Rittenhaus was born in Whitley county, Indiana, May 17, 1869, and departed this life Nov. 4, 1893, aged 24 years, 5 months and 17 days. December 5, 1891, he was united in marriage to Katy Gaskill, and to this union was born a bright little babe, Oct. 24, 1893. Clarence had a fatherly heart; he loved his wife and precious babe, but he only lived to enjoy its society a few days. He was a good neighbor and a loyal citizen. He was held in high esteem by his fellow laborers and those about him. But Clarence is gone never to return. Our tears and sighs will not help the dead, but thus help the living. Let us weep with the weeping widow and mother; may we not only lend our sympathies to this broken heart, but give of our measure to support. It is sad to see a person torn from his family in the bloom of life and health. This is one of the mysterious things of earth. Clarence leaves behind him a wife, a babe, a father and mother and a host of dear relatives to mourn his departure Funeral was conducted from the house, Monday, Nov. 6, at 2 p. m. Interment in Woodlaw, Rev. J. D. Brosy, officiating.

Mrs. Wickwire—I don't believe a man's love is as steady as a woman's.

Mr. Wickwire—Of course it isn't. When a man is really in love he can't think of anything else. But a woman can hold her attention to keeping her hat on straight, even when her lover is kissing her for the first time.

Mrs. W. P. Myers.

Auburn people will hear with profound regret of the death of Mrs. W. P. Myers, of Kendallville, though her long and severe sickness has to a certain extent prepared them for the sad event. For two or three years she has been failing, has been a constant sufferer, and all the time undergoing treatment more or less severe. A year ago in July, she was taken to Eureka Springs, Ark., and remained there till last May, when she was brought home. From this time on, there seems to have been little or no hope, and she passed out of her sufferings October 28.

Sarah Elizabeth Pfanner was born in Canal Dover, Ohio, Oct. 4, 1889, so that her age was 54 years and 24 days. She was a member of the Episcopal church in Kendallville and had always been active in good works, especially those of charity and temperance.

Mrs. Myers was married March 29, 1880, her husband being then in charge of the schools at Oak Harbor, Ohio. In August of that year they came to Auburn where he had charge of the schools here for about three years, when they moved to Kendallville. She taught some while here, her taste carrying her into work among the smaller pupils, for which she had a wonderful adaptability. She was also foremost in matters requiring literary taste and talent, being a member of the L. L. C. here. On her arrival at her new location in Kendallville, she at once identified herself with a similar club, remaining a valued member while strength for the work remained. She was greatly beloved and highly regarded wherever she had made her home, and many ladies in Auburn will join their sisters at Kendallville in dropping a tear to the memory of one they loved. The bereaved husband and family have our full measure of sympathy.

The Post Informs Us.

The Columbia City Post, that has for some time assumed charge of the consciences of Auburn democrats, last week gets off the following piece of astonishing information:

Silas J. Brandon was last week appointed postmaster at Auburn. He is well qualified for the position and his appointment is as satisfactory to all concerned as any that could have been made.

Nov, Bro. Adams, what evil genius put you up to say that? You know very well that you don't know a thing about the matter, except that he is appointed. You have not been up here, nor have you seen a man from here. You evidently said this for a purpose, not with the purpose of advancing the truth, however. You made a similar foolish break some time last spring, but do not seem to have profited by your experience. If you had said that the appointment was perfectly satisfactory to Columbia City, we should have been forced to admit that you knew more about the sentiment there than we did. But we have never insulted the intelligence of our readers by claiming to know better the sentiment in a neighboring town, than its own citizens. If the the Post is right, and so very anxious to get its opinions before the public, why not explain? If Brandon is so popular in Auburn, why were there not at least a few citizens who would go on his petition? We have tried for ten months right here in Auburn to find the name of a man who is on Brandon's petition, and have failed to find one. All the other applicants had large petitions and we suppose they were sent to Washington. But the only paper we ever heard of being sent to Washington in regard to Brandon is a remonstrance against his appointment. And yet, in view of these well-known facts, the Post is reckless enough to make the above statement. We had hoped we should not be called on to allude to this subject again, for a time at least, but justice to ourselves here in Auburn compels. We make no objection to Mr. Brandon personally and never have. But we do object, and our people object, to the dishonest means by which he has been forced into a place for which the people of Auburn made no demand. It is bad enough to have outside parties select our postmaster, without consulting us. But when a paper from another county sends us word that we are "perfectly satisfied," that is rubbing it in.

Shakespeare's Cryptogram.

If the great lawyer and philosopher, Baron Verulam, were living to-day and called upon to decide judicially the claim of Mr. Donnelly's cryptogram, this literal arrangement of the writings under discussion would afford sufficient evidence of the most direct kind to establish the question of authorship. The arrangement seems governed by too arbitrary rules to be a mere matter of chance, and is equally as remarkable, to say the least, as any of the facts set forth in Mr. Donnelly's work.

It will be observed that the fourth letter from the last, of the first sixteen plays spell Shakespeare's name, and the final letter of the twenty following asserts the matter of authorship. Whether by design or accident, the fact is none the less curious.

The Time is Coming.

Next year will be a prosperous year for newspaper people. State officers, congressmen, senators, representatives and county officers are to be elected. The newspaper people will be in demand.—Valparaiso Messenger.

Yes, they will be in demand until after election. When these state officers, congressmen, senators, representatives and county officers are elected they will have no further use for the newspaper.—Plymoth Democrat.

Worse than this; they will probably get all their job work done in Indianapolis as soon as the election is over, just as the officers in this county have done so much for many years. Oh, yes, next year and the year after even may be good years for printers. But it will be safe just now not to throw up your hat till you see it coming.

A New Great Work of Art.

The artist who painted a "Yard of Pansies' and a "Yard of Roses" has just produced a magnificent rival to these two lovely pictures. It is a floral panel picture called "An American Beauty," 20 inches high, and admirably adapted for upright narrow spaces. By an arrangement with the publishers, who are making, by the most perfect process, exquisite reproductions in oil colors of this great picture, undistinguishable from the original, we shall print a coupon in our issue of November 23 that will entitle all our readers to one of these superb creations, free. It is a great work of art, and we have pleasure in presenting such a valuable gift to our patrons. Do not fail to get a copy of this paper for the date mentioned.

Fast Line to DesMoines.

The long list of cities in the west and northwest reached without change of cars via the North-Western Line, has been increased by the addition of DesMoines, the capital city of the great state of Iowa, and passengers for that point can now leave Chicago at a convenient hour in the evening, and arrive at DesMoines the following morning in time for breakfast. The train is fully up to the high standard always maintained by the North-Western Line, and is equipped with palace sleeping cars of the latest design, and reclining chair cars in which seats are furnished free of extra charge. Maps, time tables and general information can be obtained upon application to any ticket agent or by addressing W. A. Thrall, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, Chicago & North-Western R'y, Chicago. Ill. 44-51

The Wonderful Railroads.

The B. & O. and Lake Shore have been very fortunate to get through the world's fair travel without a wreck. The B. & O. has run several sections to every passenger train for some months. The Lake Shore has done still better, having at times as many as 15 sections of the same train. The day before "New York Day" there were forty-nine west bound passenger trains on the Lake Shore road between New York City and Chicago at one time, all heavily loaded. Several other lines had equally good fortune. The only bad accidents during this great fair, when millions of people rode on trains, were those at Jackson and Battle Creek, in Michigan, and at Kingsbury, in Indiana. And even these wrecks appear small when we compare them to the amount of people carried. What infinite care, painstaking, watchfulness and judgment it must have taken to move these twenty millions in safety and comfort! No doubt the railroad men of all grades are glad it is over, and mental and physical strain lessened.

The Carbuncle Ring.

The carbuncle ring is now quite frequently seen on the hands of the fashionable gentleman. One of the rarest and most precious stones is the carbuncle, which is sometimes confounded with the ruby, from which it differs by the intensity of its fires, produced by an internal luster of gold, while under the purple of the ruby there only appear dottings of azure or lacquer. Ethiopia produced the most precious ancient carbuncles. The Chaldeans regarded this stone as a powerful talisman. The virtues of the carbuncle are resistance to fire, preservation of the eyes, promotion of pleasant dreams, creation of happy illusions and an antidote against impure air.—Bangor Commercial.

Cooking Is Now a Science.

Cookery in these latter days has become a science. Cookbooks leave no room for guesswork. We no longer mix our ingredients as the woman said she made her brown bread: "First I put in what meal I think I will need, then what rye the meal will bear; next a good sized pinch of salt; next a little flour, a trifle of molasses and as much water or milk as I think it wants, and then bake it till I see it is done."—Troy Times.

This year he has threshed about 19,000 bushels of wheat, about 30,000 of oats and about 200 bushels of clover seed. That represents a great deal of hard work.

J. P. Kandel, of Muncie, was here a few days last week on business, and visiting the old neighbors. He and F. M. Boyer went down there in March of last year, and are engaged in the manufacture of buggies of an improved pattern. He reports business fairly good for such a discouraging year. In addition to the hard times, Muncie has had a scourge of small pox for several months. This has not only interfered with business, but has been a serious damage to the town. The plague is abating now, we believe.

The meetings at the M. E. church continue with incresing interest. Many have been converted and much good is likely to result.

GOOD LOT FOR SALE: Valuable lot in the north part of town, across the street west from the Ward school. Can be had at a reasonable price. Call on Henry Schumburg. 45 6

Schaab & Bro. have a new advertisement in this week's COURIER. This is one of Auburn's firms that has steadily pulled to the front, and we think they deserve their success.

C. H. Brown of Concord was here on Monday. Cal. must be pretty busy now-a-days tying up stoves and hardware for the St. Joeites, for one seldom sees him in town lately.

Mrs. Geo. Emerick, of Fairfield, was here last week. She has got through the law suits that have been up between her and her sons, and we have no doubt they are all glad it is done.

H. H. Smith, of Newville was here on Tuesday. He is looking for the return of his son, John E. Smith, at an early day. He has been working at the carpenter trade at Sparta, in Michigan.

There will be a meeting in the Carmer school house east of town, to-morrow, Friday evening, for the purpose of organizing a literary and debating society. All who are interested in these socities are invited to come.

Thanksgiving service will be held at the Reformed church, Auburn Ind., Sunday morning at 10 o'clock in the German language, and in the evening at 7 o'clock in the English language. All are cordially invited. Geo. Engelmann, pastor.

C. H. Crew will visit many of our people soon, with the two valuable remedies for which he is agent. He is a deserving and unfortunate man. His remedies are sold at a low price. Keep a little change till he comes, if you need the medicine.

There will be an open meeting at the G. A. R. Hall next Monday evening, Nov. 13. A splendid program has been prepared, consisting of speeches, songs and other social and literary work. All come out and enjoy the hours which we shall try to make pleasant.

Mr. E. E. Darling, a brother of Dr. H. Darling, has been here visiting the family of the latter a few days. His home is at Miller, South Dakota, but, before he returns there he expects to visit our beautiful capitol city, Indianapolis, and make a study of some of our state charitable institutions.

Rev. J. N. Scholes, of the Christian church at Corunna, was here recently. He is a son of Nelson Scholes, of Concord, and brother to Frank Scholes, the civil engineer, well known here. Frank is now at Chicago in the engineer service of the drainage committee that is making the big canal to carry off the water to the westward.

The missionary meeting at Grove Bethel Sunday evening was a grand success all round, both in the entertainment and the collection. The six little girls who had the missionary barrels raised something like $20. The prize, which was a neat little bible, was awarded to Olive Elson, she having the greatest amount of money in her barrel. There was a very large attendance.

There are still several hundreds of our subscribers who have allowed their subscriptions to get two or three, or more years behind, and we have waited on them patiently since the hard times began a year ago last May. Now we think each ought to make an extra effort to square up. Waiting on so many has been a serious drawback to us, and now let us take a business view of it and get even or partly even.

The Postal Telegraph people have had quite a force of men along here since last Friday morning, putting in new poles along Seventh street. They had, we are told, expected to turn north one block and go through town on Sixth street so as to avoid the high trees on Seventh. But the poles they put up are very tall and will clear the trees much better than the first set. But the first set were the largest ever seen in this section at the time they were first put up.

This week we take up in order to finish our "Old Marriages." The complete "1875" will take two more numbers of the COURIER. Then as '76 is reached we stop for the present. The history of "Auburn and Vicinity" will also be concluded when we reach the same date. These articles have taken a great deal of work, but we believe these chapters of our quiet home history have been appreciated at least by the older people We only wish we could secure as thorough a history of all parts of the county.

THE trouble with many men is that they do not think, they only think they think.

THEY say that the reason why so many women chew gum is that they love to keep their jaws going whether they say anything or not.

ONE of the saddest things about pugilists is that after the world ceases to hear about their fights it continues to be worried with their bad acting.

TO BE thoroughly healthy a man should take an hour of exercise to every pound of food he eats. It is not what one eats which increases the blood and flesh but what one digests.

OF course the educated pig who picks out letters with his snout at the circus belongs to a littery family, but he differs from other learned animals in this respect that he gets a living "in" and not "by" his pen.

THIS year has been disastrous to the reputations of persons given to prophecy. We have been mercifully spared from realizing the gloomy predictions of a second-year visitation of cholera, and on the contrary the health of the country has been exceptionally good. None of the owlish predictions of epidemic have been fulfilled. The prophets of our day are entitled to but little honor in their own country or elsewhere.

TOM KEENE'S acting does not please the dramatic critic of the Milwaukee Sentinel. His mouth is too restless and migratory in its habits. It travels all over his face and is equally noisy at all its stopping places. This peculiarity of Mr. Keene has been commented upon by other observers. His features are wonderfully acrobatic and hard to hold. In pantomime—on a darkened stage, let us say—Mr. Keene would be a most pleasing actor.

BELLE BILTON, the ex-music hall singer, who the other day presented her husband, the Earl of Clancarty, with a daughter, is an unconventional personage, as nearly everyone knows. "Are you aware, madame, that this is a smoking compartment," said a gentleman to her ladyship, as she entered a railroad car at Euston Square station, London, not long ago. "All right, old chappie; going to smoke, myself," replied the countess, drawing forth a cigarette case and lighting up, while the polite gentleman withdrew into his corner covered with confusion.

IN all ages of the world men have believed that dreams have a meaning, and there are undoubtedly thousands of instances in ancient and modern times of dreams having "come true." While it may be too much to assert that all dreams have a significance, it may be safe to say that some scientists have ventured the opinion that dreams which come in the early hours of the morning are more liable to be prophetic than others, because at that time the mind is partially awake and can take a clear insight into such subjects as pass before it in review. The great poet says:

> We are such stuff as dreams are made of,
> And our little life is rounded with a sleep.

A DOLEFUL report of Canadian immigration and emigration has just emanated from Ottawa. It practically shows that the population of the country has not only come to a halt but that it is beginning to retrograde. The depletion results from two sources. Emigration to the United States has been unusually heavy during the past year, and immigation has been abnormally light. The Canadian Government is hopelessly in debt, and the people live in perpetually "hard times" because of excessive taxes and inability to market their products in competition with the United States. The only way out for the Canadians is the way in.

NEW YORK MAIL AND EXPRESS: Of course hazing is wrong and ought to be suppressed in all our institutions of learning. If the ordinary modes and limits of dicipline are not sufficient, then the stern hand of the law should be called upon to put an end to it. It is often brutal and ruffianly, always silly, ungenerous and cowardly. A dozen or twenty conceited and pompous sophomores will drag one poor, shivering freshman from his bed at midnight in the dead of winter, risk his life by exposure to cold, and commit various indignities and insults upon him for no other offense than that of wearing headgear of wrong shape or color or carrying a cane. And this, by some curious subversion of their ordinary common sense, they call manly, dignified and proper. Yet, probably no one of those same dozen sophomores would dare stand up against that freshman in fair fight. They gain their courage, or rather show their cowardice, by their number.

IF capital and labor would only be more generally tolerant of each other the condition of affairs in this and in every other civilized country would be much more pleasant than it is. Once in awhile a few rays of bright sunshine penetrate the clouds, but the illumination is much too infrequent. For more than four weeks the King Philip Mills at Fall River, Mass., were closed, and the employes, of course, were idle. Recently the mills resumed operation, and when the hands received their pay for the first week of toil after the reopening they were much surprised to learn that the mill owners—who also owned the houses occupied by their workpeople—had remitted the rent for the month of enforced inactivity. It was a pleasant and proper and in a broad sense a profitable thing to do. It was one of the best investments the mill-owners ever made.

SO FAR as the evidence at hand goes, the responsibility for the Battle Creek wreck rests directly upon Conductor Scott and Engineer Woolley, of the east-bound train. They received an order from the train dispatcher, and under the rules of the road they telegraphed back that they understood it. That order, if obeyed, would have averted the wreck. They deliberately disobeyed it and the dreadful catastrophe followed. The engineer, according to the telegraphed reports, is trying to throw the blame upon the conductor, while the conductor seeks to saddle the engineer with the responsibility. These conflicting statements can be weighed by a jury. Under the rules of train dispatching the men are equally culpable, each having received a copy of the order and each having signified his understanding of it. The legal — the criminal—responsibility will be settled in court. There is no talk of accident in this case. The wreck was indisputably due to criminal carelessness or recklessness. The public will insist that the men responsible shall be properly punished.

IF the so-called "perfected" air brake fails to work when it is most needed the railroad companies would better go back to the old hand brakes, with a sufficient number of muscular brakemen to twist them. The hand brake is not so convenient as the air brake, and trains would have to be run slower while approaching stations, but the probability of accidents like that at Jackson would be greatly lessened by its use. We have been assured that there was no vulnerable point about the air brake. It has been asserted that if the engineer could not control the brakes the independent automatic brakes on each car could be relied upon with certainty. The Jackson accident disapproves this assertion—unless somebody is lying. If the trainmen are to be believed the automatic brakes did not work. The train went flying ahead beyond the control of engineer or conductor. If this happened once it may happen again. Engineers have grown accustomed to the air brake and rely upon it to a dangerous extent. They run their trains into stations at high speed, depending upon their air brakes to check the momentum in time to avoid disaster. The Jackson wreck shows the confidence to be misplaced. Is it not time to take steps to guard against further disaster?

THE New York World has discovered, so it says, that the big magazines are obtaining money under false pretenses. It is declared that five out of the thirteen most noteworthy articles in the October magazines were not written by the persons whose names are signed to them, but by hack writers who secured the right to use the names of these famous people. No one will be particularly surprised at this charge, and few magazine readers will be inclined to doubt its truth. Of late years the magazine editors have been eager to print articles from persons famous or notorious in any walk of life. We have heard from preachers and pugilists, bankers and bicyclists, statesmen and singers. Some of the people whose names have been signed to published articles probably cannot spell words of two syllables, yet the public has been asked to believe that they have written essays or stories several thousand words in length, in well-balanced, grammatical English. Of course, no one has believed anything of the sort. It has been tacitly understood that the editor or some one else has taked the contributor's facts and licken them into shape. There has been a suspicion, too, that some of the articles from the higher grade of contributors were written by proxy. Indeed, the charge has been openly made in one or two instances. The World's indictment, therefore, only puts into shape the suspicions, amounting almost to certainty, that have been entertained by magazine readers ever since the notoriety hunting era began, and it will be sustained by nine out of ten people who have given the matter any thought.

Labor Lost.

Prudence is one of the virtues that naturally go with age, but sometimes it is developed early.

"Tommy," said a thoughtful mother "your Uncle William will be here to dinner to-day, and you must wash your face."

"Yes, ma," said the thrifty Thomas "but s'posen he don't come. What then?"

THE Mayor of Birmingham, Ala. who is also the police magistrate of the city, seems to be a court that is always in session and always an object of contempt. At any rate, a minor city employe—probably a bridgetender, if there are bridge tenders in Birmingham—who greeted the executive on the street with "Hello! old hoss," was fined $10 for contempt by the austere and punctilious mayor.

FOR AN INCOME TAX.

SENTIMENT IN ITS FAVOR IS SPREADING.

Congressman Warner, Who Represents the Wealthiest District in This Country, Is in Favor of Taxing Men's Wealth Rather than Their Wants.

Tax on Incomes.

In the face of a prospective deficit of $70,000,000, on one hand, and the emphatic demand of the people to reduce tariff duties, on the other hand, Democratic Congressmen who feel the responsibility of the situation are casting about for a way out of the predicament. Many of them from the South and West have long been in favor of an income tax. In fact, they introduced about twenty different income tax bills during the first session of the last Congress. During the last few months Representatives from all parts of the country have declared for an income tax. The Hon. John DeWitt Warner, of the Thirteenth Congressional District of New York, probably represents more very large incomes than any other Congressman. His district is the home of millionaires and multi-millionaires. The Vanderbilts, Goulds, Astors, Rockefellers, Havemeyers, Whitneys, and perhaps 400 or 500 more of the wealthiest of New York City's 1,200 or 1,300 millionaires live in this district. Under an income tax this district would probably contribute more to the revenue than any other district and more than any one State, except perhaps ten or twelve of the largest. And yet Mr. Warner is not afraid to advocate an income tax. He not only thinks it more just than a tariff tax, but he believes it would meet the approval of the tens of thousands of mechanics, clerks and laborers in his district. We quote the following from an interview with Mr. Warner in the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin of Oct 21:

"I certainly prefer an income tax, if it is necessary to raise sufficient revenue, rather than the retention of such high tariff duties as to involve an inordinate proportion of protection. I would not hesitate a minute how to vote if the question were presented between a protective tariff which would furnish the necessary revenue and a bill which made the duties one-third lower, and enacted an income tax to supply the deficiency. Personally, I think it would not be long before a substantially revenue tariff would bring as much money into the Treasury as would higher rates, because not only would imports increase as the result of lower tariff rates but we should have such an era of prosperity that exports would greatly increase and would naturally be paid for to a large extent by a further increase of imports."

"But do you think it necessary to put the entire machinery for collecting an income tax into operation to raise $20,000,000 or $30,000,000?" was asked.

"The machinery need be no more elaborate than for the collection of any other tax, and I fear the amount of the deficit to be provided for the first year may reach $50,000,000 or more. I do not think, however, that an income tax would be really necessary, because the increase in customs receipts under a revenue tariff might soon give us a surplus, and we could issue in the meantime Treasury certificates redeemable at the pleasure of the Government within not more than ten years. There may be a disposition in the House, however, to insist upon legislation which will meet the whole revenue problem at once. Members may say that my expectation of increased customs receipts is only a prediction, and that adequate revenue ought to be certainly provided for now. We shall then have a contest between different plans for meeting the emergency. There will be the same opposition to an income tax that there is to any new form of taxation; and of the contest between the income tax, the plan for issue of bonds, and other plans, I should not be surprised if the final outcome were authority to meet any temporary deficit by the issue of short-term bonds in anticipation of income, leaving the question of whether an income tax is needed to be settled by experiment, and this seems to me to be the best plan at present."

"But do you not think that the needed revenue can be raised by increasing the internal revenue tax on beer or whisky?"

"I presume that it could be raised by doubling the beer tax," replied Mr. Warner; "but I do not favor such a proposition as supplementing a tariff already so high as to levy from those in poor or moderate circumstances the greater part of the necessary income of the Government. If it is true that an income tax would levy its heaviest burdens on the rich, while it let the poor escape taxation, this would hardly be more than a fair offset for the enormously disproportionate burden which is imposed upon consumption instead of wealth by tariff taxation. The increase of the tax on beer would simply carry further the same wrong theory of legislation. If, however, it was a question of taking it off of clothes and putting it on beer, I would be for taking it off of clothes, but I am not in favor of putting it on both in order to saddle the whole tax on consumption."

"But do you believe that the increase in the tax on beer would affect the retail price?" asked your correspondent.

"The consumer would have to pay it in the end. You cannot lay a tax upon a theory that it will not affect the cost of the articles on which it is laid. The consumer would have to pay the increase, whether it was in smaller glasses or poorer beer or a reduction of the inducement to competition among producers.

"I repeat: If wealth already paid most of the Federal taxes, and in some emergency the question arose as how to increase the revenues by taxes on consumption, I might think a plumping levy on beer to be a good thing. But the trouble is that the most of our Federal taxes are now levied on consumption; such will be the case even when the tariff is reduced to a revenue basis; and, therefore, if we need additional taxes I believe in levying them on men's wealth rather than on men's wants."

Free Trade Factories.

Without any enmity whatever toward the Northeast, the interior States and the South, which have the power, should reform the tariff thoroughly in the interest of their own manufacturing development. No great skill is required to see that under absolute free trade manufacturing would be more profitable in the South and West than in the East. Importations would be chiefly for the East, as the cost of transportation would increase rapidly after goods left the ship for the railroad. Southern iron and cotton and Western wool, wood and hides would be made up near the supply of material and the home market. The Northeast would be forced to export manufactured goods more extensively. Thus the Northeast would work to get gold with cheap goods and the South and West would have a larger home market for wheat, corn and meat. The sections now almost entirely agricultural would be relieved of part of their dependence on European markets for prices and on the Northeast for capital. The deeper tariff reform goes the better in every way for the South and West.

Why Agriculture Is Depressed.

At the close of the war it was hoped that those measures and policies which were the outgrowth of the struggle would be set aside, and that legislation would be enacted to relieve the people of the burdens of taxation which they had uncomplainingly borne. In this they were not gratified. On the contrary, in the year 1867—two years after the close of the war—the doctrine of "protection for protection's sake" was inaugurated, and the Congress of that year, instead of lessening the tax burdens, increased them. The pernicious doctrine of "protection for protection's sake" was not satisfied with the almost prohibitory character of many of the then tariff duties. They had tasted blood, and, like the daughters of the horse-leech, they cried for more This infamous system of taxation reached its culmination in the passage of the "McKinley bill." Never have the people of any nation on the earth given up in taxation, in the same length of time, as large an amount of money as have the people of the United States. These taxes are not shown in the receipts of customs by the Government. That shown there was enjoyed by the Government. True, much of the revenue has been expended in wasteful extravagance; but still it went into the Government coffers and was spent by the Government. But the custom revenues are but a tithe of the tax paid by the consumers of the country. For every dollar received by the Government six have been paid to the protected industries. On this forced contribution of the people the manufacturers have grown enormously wealthy, and the consumers have grown correspondingly poor.

The cause of the present depression has its origin in the immense taxes imposed on the people by the tariff laws. In the vicious legislation which throws around manufacturing vocations the protecting care of the government and leaves the most important industry (that of agriculture) to struggle along without government aid. The protection policy not only robs the farmer by demanding tribute from him but it has destroyed the foreign market. The nations which were formerly the purchasers of the products of our farms have adopted the McKinley doctrine of exclusiveness and have built up cereal-growing districts. They are independent of the American farmer. They have given kind for kind, which is most wonderfully human. Agriculture is the source of all wealth, and with it depressed all other vocations must suffer, and therefore the reasons of the present unwholesome conditions are found in the fact that agriculture has been impoverished that manufacturers might grow rich.—Pomeroy (Ohio) Democrat.

The Less Protection the Better.

Western and Southern staple producers never needed a tariff for revenue more than now. A tariff for revenue is equivalent to a reduced cost of transportation both ways. Every farmer knows what reduced transportation charges do for the movement of crops and the purchase of goods. Farm debts never pressed more heavily and farm profits were never more unsatisfactory. Wheat prices drag. Cotton is no better, and the big packing houses have claimed that they must cut down expenses. These are the three great sources of our export trade.

For seventy years the tariff question has been the same—how much the staple producers should be charged for the support of Government and the maintenance of certain lines of manufacture. Not only how much actual money they should pay, but how much restriction of trade they could stand. Radical additions to taxation and restriction have been made without notice to the staple producers. The imposition of new burdens in 1883 and 1890 was made when all the pledges out were for reduction. In spite of that habitual treatment the agricultural States do not ask for an immediate blotting out of all protection. Their expectation is that a Democratic Ways and Means Committee will present a bill whose guiding purpose will be the encouragement of trade and production. The raising of revenue necessitates some protection as long as we have a tariff of any kind. We can stand that much protection, and not a great deal more.

It has always been the case heretofore, when a tariff bill is in course of preparation, that the country hears a great deal about the effect on the protected industries. This time we have a right to hear less about that and more about cheap transportation and the encouraging effect on export industries. When the Ways and Means Committee in its experiments gets to a bill for the merchants, farmers, school teachers, preachers, lawyers, carpenters, masons and blacksmiths it can stop right there. That bill will be good enough.—St. Louis Republic.

No Escape from a Lower Tariff.

Until the silver question is disposed of little will be heard of the tariff. But the high protectionists should not take the general silence upon the latter issue to mean a weakening of the popular determination to reduce and revise the rates. Henry McCormick, of Harrisburg, Pa., one of the wealthiest iron and steel manufacturers in the country, a Scotchman, like Carnegie, who early saw what high duties meant for his purse and who was largely instrumental in securing the enactment of the steel rail duties, says in a recent interview:

"In the prosperous period of the last twenty years the steel and iron industries of this country have been placed on a firm business basis through the fostering care of the tariff, and they are able to stand alone now. The steel industry no longer needs such a strong prop. I advocated a high tariff for steel rails years ago, when a tariff was needed, but I believe the American manufacturers have grown sufficiently wealthy, and their plants have been so well equipped with the latest improved machinery that they can afford to compete with the foreign manufacturers on the same level before long."

This frank admission that now that he and Carnegie and the rest have filled their pockets out of it, the tariff may well go as a thing which has outgrown its usefulness even to them, very well represents the popular thought on this question. The people believe these industries are better able to stand alone now than before, and need less instead of higher duties. They have so expressed themselves at the polls, and are determined to try the experiment of lower duties. This talk that the panic has demonstrated anything against tariff reform or changed public opinion is not only without foundation but mischievous to the protected interests. The wiser course for them is to adopt a more yielding attitude toward the popular verdict and thus place themselves in a position to influence the impending action of Congress in the way of conservatism, and also in the way of expedition.—Springfield Republican.

CLOSE OF AN EPOCH.

END OF THE WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

Oration and Song Give Way to Prayer and Dirge at the Finale of a Joyous Season—Exercises Held in Festival Hall—Last Day Shrouded in Gloom.

Now a Reminiscence.

The end came at sunset on Oct. 30. The great Columbian Exposition faded as quietly and sadly as an autumn day, and when the belching cannon had sent a score of shots to heaven and pelted the domes and pinnacles with a million echoes the giant had died. Silver-throated chimes tolled the knell, murmuring fountains sang the requiem, white clouds hung as the shroud. The night stole on, the breakers slept, the lagoons grew as calm as painted ponds, the lights blinked out and it was over. It passed as gently as the withering of a summer rose, to leave a memory as sweet as the fragrance of an incense pot. The mighty organ groaned and wept, the preacher prayed, the whizzing pulleys ceased their jangle, the rattling wheels hung silent, the throttles were choked.

The waning moon looked down at midnight upon a wilderness of beauty awaiting the assassin's ax. Columns, towers and turrets, portals, peristyle and palaces, Dianas, mermaids and heroes, archers, Neptunes and pyramids, sculptors' groups and artists' panels, treasures of genius and marvels of brain, all stood mute at the altar side, awaiting the torch to make them ashes. It was a sight sadder than a funeral and as melancholy as a winter forest. The wind sent shafts to the marrow and rattled grewsomely in the withered leaves and frosted boughs, and from end to end the fairy acres were as somber as the valley of the shadow of death.

The End Comes in Woe.

There were no pageants, no long lines of gorgeous floats, no noisy processions. Neither bombs nor mortars rent the sky, nor were sizzling rockets loosed. There were no merry banqueters, no concerts, no jubilees. The trumpeters who heralded the Fair were silent, and the thousands who sang the patriotic hyms a half year ago were hushed. The flaming fagots that flared under the ribs of the gilded dome were unlighted. There were no epics read, no striding meters unrolled, no majestic bars blown by the wind. There were no chapeaux, no epaulets, no gathering of the nation's great. No orators scaled the heights with congratulatory eloquence, no gonfalon fell at the signal of a potentate. All the fetes became funeral pyres; rejoicing hymns were turned to songs of sadness, and triumphant strains were dropped to death marches. Tears ran where smiles were wont and sorrow filled breasts where pride was due. Pity for the end became grief for the calamity and all the thousands mourned the tragedy which ended the grandest event of four wonderful centuries. Fate had been cruel and in its unkindness had added a piteous death as the climax. Thus the sadness of the end was twofold and the great Fair went out under a double cloud.

The final function was in Festival Hall. President Palmer held the center of the line of honor, and on either side were President Higinbotham and Director General Davis. Behind them sat distinguished men, whose homes make a circuit of the earth. After an invocation by Mr. Barrows and an address by Mr. Higinbotham, President Palmer formally executed the edict of Congress.

Simple in the extreme were the closing acts. The war ship and revenue sloop loosed their guns and all about the grounds rolled the roar of the last act. Sailors were stationed at each flag mast, and when the first shot echoed to the shore the halyards were drawn and the emblems of sixty nations were furled. The streamers on the staffs of honor in the main court came down to earth, the dream was over and the World's Columbian Exposition became a memory.

One Source of German Strength.

There is no doubt that the Germans are the strongest people on earth and probably the most prolific, and I believe it is to their eating black bread. A great deal of the nourishment must be wasted in refining flour as it is now done by all civilized nations. The bread is made more palatable, perhaps more digestible for weak, worn out stomachs, but black bread must be the true staff of life. The Germans do not eat much fresh meat. There may be some in other parts of the country, but along the Rhine you never see cattle grazing in pastures. I did not see one sheep in all my tramps, and the only cows I saw were the poor things hitched to heavy carts doing the work of oxen. There is no milk along the Rhine to speak of. I got no taste of cream and the eggs I had were stale. Black bread, then, is what this people live on, and with it they thrive and grow to be mighty conquerors.—Chamber's Journal.

Down-East Christianizers.

An enterprising firm in Caribou purchased several dozen wire springs designed for holding the restive tail of a cow during the task of milking. A revival was in progress at the time, and all of one farmer's family and his hired man had "experienced religion," but the old gentleman himself said he could never become a Christian while he had to milk the cows, for he couldn't help swearing when one of their tails struck him across the face. This firm heard of the man, sought him out, and finally succeeded in disposing of one of their springs to him under solemn assurance that it would entirely cure him of profanity. And from that day to this those springs have never been known as anything but "Christainizers."—Lewiston Evening Journal.

Rise and Fall of the Bastile.

The famous French prison known as the Bastile was originally the Castle of Paris, and was built by order of Charles V. between 1370 and 1383, as a defense against the English. When it came to be used as a State Prison it was provided with vast bulwarks and ditches. It had four towers, of five stories each, on each of its larger sides, and it was partly in these towers and partly in underground cellars that the prisons were situated. It was capable of containing from seventy to eighty prisoners, a number frequently reached during the reigns of Louis XIV. and Louis XV. The Bastile was destroyed by a mob July 15, 1789. On the site now stands the Column of July, erected in memory of the patriots of 1789 and 1830.—Detroit Free Press.

A Widely Prevalent Malady.

While it is perfectly true that swamp vapors, morning and evening mists along the banks of slow, winding, turbid streams and the effluvium exhaled by the sun from moist and decaying vegetables beget malaria, it frequently breaks out where no such conditions exist. It is, in fact, a malady widely prevalent, of which it is in many cases impossible to discover the origin. But though its causes are often obscure, the testimony, professional and public, of the inhabitants of America and other lands leaves no reasonable doubt not only that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters uproots this tenacious disease when fully developed, but fortifies the system against its first attacks. Chills and fever, bilious intermittent, dumb ague, and ague all yield to it alike. Liver trouble, always present in malarial disorder, dyspepsia, constipation, and kidney complaint succumb to the Bitters.

Shop Talk.

They had asked Dr. Sandblast, the eminent surgeon, to carve the festal fowl, and he stood over it with the carving-knife held delicately in the first position. "The incision, you will observe, gentlemen," he began, dreamily, "commences a little to the left of the median line, and—oh, excuse me, Mrs. Parmalee, I thought I was in the—may I help you to a little of the femur?"

What, Indeed!

When a member of the Church Congress at Manchester argued that the introduction of the custom of cremation would endanger belief in the resurrection of the dead, the reply of Lord Shaftesbury silenced any further doubt when he asked: "What, then, has become of the holy martrys who were cremated?"

True Repentance.

One of the sovereign people broke a chair over his wife's head. When taken to jail and conversed with by the chaplain, he displayed a good deal of repentance. He said he "was very sorry that he had permitted his auger to obtain the mastery over him and to suffer him to do such an act, for the chair was a good one, an heirloom in his family, and he knew he never could replace it."

HEAD AND SHOULDERS above every other blood-purifier, stands Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. See the evidence of it. It's sold in every case, on trial. If it ever fails to benefit or cure, you have your money back.

In restoring your strength, when you're "run-down" and "used-up;" in cleansing your blood from every impurity, whether it's a simple eruption or the worst scrofula; and in building up wholesome flesh when you're thin and weak—there's nothing to equal the "Discovery." In every disease caused by a torpid liver or impure blood, it's the only guaranteed remedy.

MRS. ELIZABETH J. BUSHWAW, of Sidney, Ohio, writes: "My little boy was so afflicted with liver trouble and other diseases that our family physician said he could not live. In fact, they all thought so. I gave him Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery and Pellets and they saved his life. We have used the 'Discovery' for throat and bronchial trouble, and found such perfect relief that we can recommend it very highly."

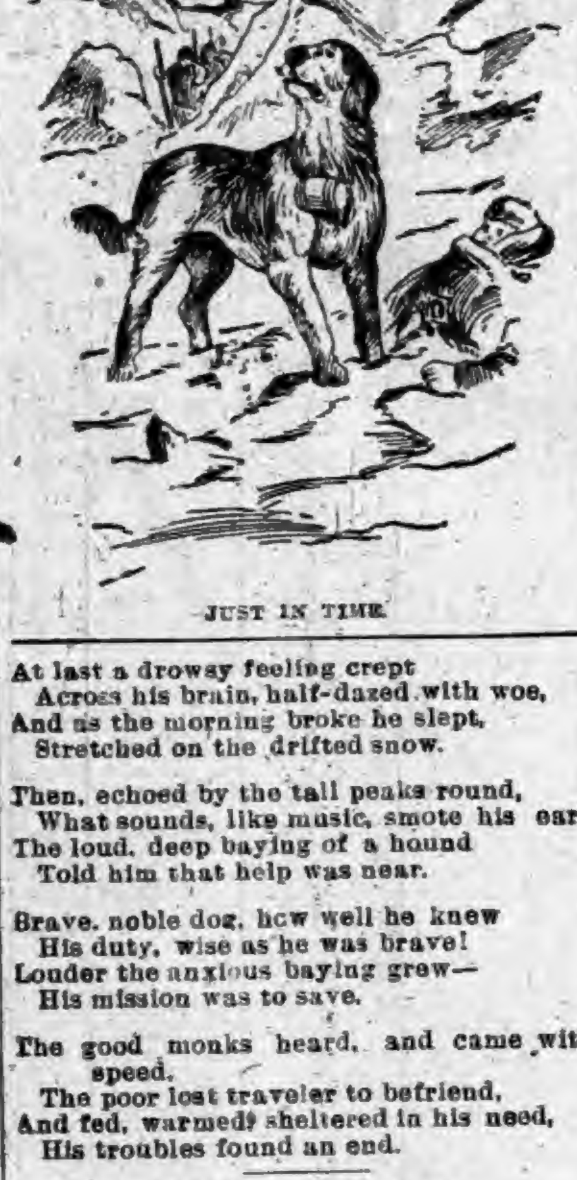
Lost on the Alps.

In cold and darkness, long ago,
  Where freezing mists hung damp and gray
On Alpine summits white with snow,
  A traveler lost his way.

The faint moon had withdrawn her light;
  No star was seen in all the sky;
Vainly for aid that awful night
  He uttered cry on cry.



JUST IN TIME.

At last a drowsy feeling crept
  Across his brain, half-dazed with woe,
And as the morning broke he slept,
  Stretched on the drifted snow.

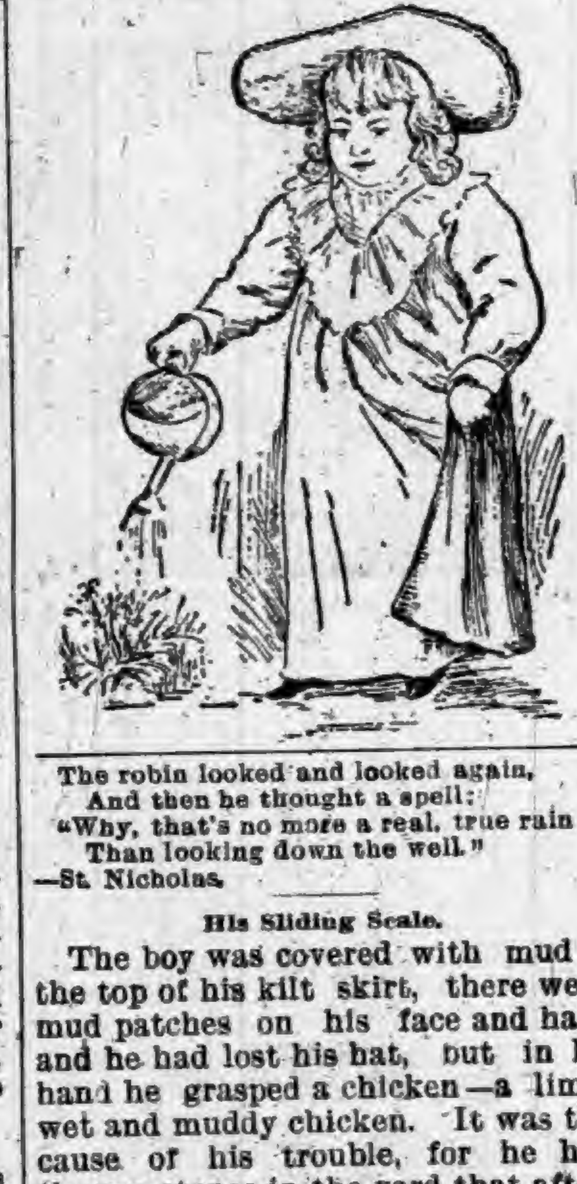
Then, echoed by the tall peaks round,
  What sounds, like music, smote his ear?
The loud, deep baying of a hound
  Told him that help was near.

Brave, noble dog, how well he knew
  His duty, wise as he was brave!
Louder the anxious baying grew—
  His mission was to save.

The good monks heard, and came with speed,
  The poor lost traveler to befriend,
And fed, warmed, sheltered in his need,
  His troubles found an end.

Watering the Flowers.

"Ah—there 's rain," piped Robin Red,
  Perched in his peach-tree tower.
"Now, keep away," the posies said;
  "This is a private shower."



The robin looked and looked again,
  And then he thought a spell:
"Why, that's no more a real, true rain Than looking down the well."
—St. Nicholas.

His Sliding Scale.

The boy was covered with mud to the top of his kilt skirt, there were mud patches on his face and hair, and he had lost his hat, but in his hand he grasped a chicken—a limp, wet and muddy chicken. It was the cause of his trouble, for he had thrown stones in the yard that afternoon, and had accidentally killed the chicken. His sister had declared that she could not love such a cruel boy. Then he had disappeared and had been found stuck in a swamp.

When he saw his mother his feelings overcame him and he burst into a loud wail.

"My sister doesn't love me! my sister doesn't love me! I want to get lost in the woods and let the bears eat me!"

"But," said his mother, "you cried when you pinched your finger with the clothespin, and it would hurt you far more if the bear should eat you."

The boy was interested and dried his tears. "I mean a kind, tame bear," he said, choking a sob.

"But a tame bear has sharp teeth."

The boy rubbed his eyes with his muddy hand, and was lost in thought for a while. Then he raised his head. His countenance was cheerful, there was not a trace of sorrow in his tone, and he cried, "I mean—I mean a nice little curly dog without any teef."—Harper's Young People.

The Size of the Sea.

There are not many people who, if they were to be asked the question, could tell the size of the salt waters of the earth. The figures are so great that they could only say, with Dominie Sampson, "Prodigious!" And yet some interesting illustrations and comparisons may be given as to the size of the sea, and here is a simple one found in Golden Days: The whole sea is composed of the Atlantic and Pacific, the Indian Ocean, the Arctic and Antaractic Seas and various smaller bodies of water. It has an area of 140,000,000 square miles and would form a circle of 13,350 miles in diameter. The relative size of the areas of the whole surface of the earth, of the whole sea, of the Pacific, and of the Atlantic can be represented by a silver dollar for the surface of the earth, a half dollar for the surface of the whole sea, a 25-cent piece for the surface of the Pacific, and a silver half dime for the surface of the Atlantic.

A Lesson of Trust.

Some time ago a little boy was discovered in the streets, evidently very bright and intelligent, but sick. A man who had the feeling of kindness strongly developed, went to him, shook him by the shoulder, and asked him what he was doing there.

"Waiting for God to come for me," said he earnestly.

"What do you mean?" said the gentleman, touched by the pathetic tone of the answer and the condition of the boy, in whose eyes and flushed face he saw the evidence of fever.

"God sent for father and mother and little brother," said he, "and took them away to his home up in the sky, and mother told me when she was sick that God would take care of me. I have no home, nobody to give me anything, and I came out here and have been looking so long up in the sky for God to take me, as mother said he would. He will come, won't he? Mother never told a lie."

"Yes, my lad," said the man, greatly overcome with emotion. "He has sent me to take care of you."

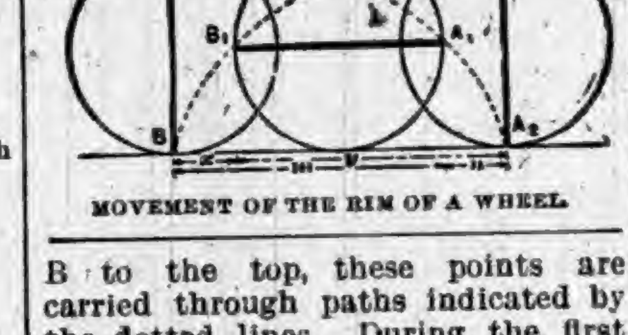
You should have seen his eyes flash and the smile of triumph break over his face, as he said: "Mother never told a lie, sir; but you have been so long on the way."

THE RIM OF A WHEEL.

Explanation of Why the Top Moves Faster than the Bottom.

The statement that the top of a wheel moves faster than the bottom has occasioned much discussion by practical men in all lines of business, and frequently they have aired their views in these columns. Our excellent contemporary, Power, recently published the following lucid explanation of the problem:

The angular velocity of all parts of the wheel about the hub is the same. The linear velocity about the hub of all points in the wheel is proportionate to their distance from the center, whether above or below the center. With reference to the ground or a stationary object the top of the wheel advances the faster, but as every point in the wheel is consecutively assuming that position the forward motion of the wheel as a whole, is, of course, the same. In the accompanying sketch the top of a wheel is marked A, the bottom B. As the wheel makes a half revolution, bringing A to the bottom and B to the top, these points are carried through paths indicated by the dotted lines. During the first quarter revolution A has gone to A1, B only to B, but during the next quarter A goes only to A2, while B goes to B2. The curve traced is a cycloid. While the point B was below the hub it went ahead only the distance x; when it was above it went ahead with reference to the ground the distance y. When A was above the center it went ahead the distance m, after it fell below the center it only made the distance n in the same time, but x plus y equals m plus n. The apparent anomaly that different parts of the same wheel can travel at different speeds is explained by remembering that it is the speed as between one part of the wheel and a stationary object, not as between different parts of the same wheel that is considered. In the first position A and B are at equal distances from a point in front of the carriage. In the second position A is ahead of B in the direction of movement of the carriage a distance to the diameter of the wheel. In the third position they are again even, for one loses below the center as much as the other gains above.



MOVEMENT OF THE RIM OF A WHEEL.

ADROIT JOKER.

To be successful in his calling, an auctioneer should be a ready joker. Some amusing stories are told of a former member of the craft, a man of some social importance, who turned auctioneer after he had failed in business several times. He opened proceedings with an excellent entertainment of oysters and champagne. He was the life of the company, and was called upon, of course, for a speech, probably for half a dozen. One of his good things, toward the close, is worth remembering. It particularly pleased the trade at that time. "Gentlemen," said he, in allusion to the entertainment, "we are scattering our bread upon the waters, and we expect to find it after many days—buttered!" It was in retail sales, however, in the small change of the auction room, that his wit appeared to the most advantage. No catalogue could be too dull for his vivacity. He was always rapid, and an unwary customer would be decapitated by his quick electric jest before he felt the stroke. "Is this binding calf?" asked a suspicious customer. "Come up, my good sir, put your hand on it, and see if there is any fellow-feeling," was the ready reply. His puns were always happy. Offering one of the Rev. Dr. Hawks' books, he added, in an explanatory way, "A bird of pray." "Going—going—gentlemen—one shilling for Caroline Fry—why, it isn't the price of a stew." Akin to this was his observation to a purchaser who had secured a copy of "Bacon's Essays" for twelve and a half cents, "That is too much pork for a shilling." Selling a book labeled "History of the Tartars," he was asked, "Isn't that Tartars?" "No," he replied, "their wives were the tartars." "This," said he, holding up a volume of a well-known type to critics, "is a book by a poor and pious girl, of poor and pious poems." He was equally apt in introducing a quotation. Some women one day found their way into the auction room to a miscellaneous sale of furniture. They were excited to an emulous contention for a saucepan, or something of the sort. Keese gave gave them a fair chance, with a final appeal—"going—going—'the woman who deliberates is lost'—gone!"

IN the fall our country roads are usually better than at any other time, and crops can then be most easily hauled to market, but farmers often wish to hold until later in the season, in the hope of better prices, and then they find the roads so bad, especially toward spring, that the cost of marketing is largely increased. This is one argument in favor of good roads, that they would be good all the year, and so facilitate the selling of crops when they could be sold to the best advantage.

Cause for Thanks.

In driving with Whittier one day Emerson pointed out a small unpainted house by the roadside and said: "There lives an old Calvinist in that house and she says she prays for me every day. I am glad she does. I pray for myself." "Does thee?" said Whittier; "what does thee pray for, friend Emerson?" "Well," replied Emerson, "when I first open my eyes upon the morning meadows and look out upon the beautiful world, I thank God that I am alive and that I live so near Boston."

Cream of Tartar and Soda

Have uses in cooking well known to every housekeeper; but the method of refining them to make them chemically pure, and of mixing them together so as to produce their greatest leavening power and best results when combined, is a matter of great exactness, requiring the most expert knowledge and skill.

Royal Baking Powder

Is the product of this knowledge and experience and the expenditure of many thousands of dollars in patents and appliances for its preparation. It is a compound of strictly pure grape cream of tartar and absolutely pure soda, combined with exactness and care by famous chemists, and it will produce more wholesome and delicate bread, biscuit, cake, rolls, etc., than can be had where this modern agent of cooking is not used.

Beware of the cheap compounds called baking powders to catch the unwary. They are made with alum and are poisonous.

Carry Their Own Gas Jets.

"A pair of nippers and half a dozen eighteen-inch gasburner tips," was the order given by a jaunty young woman who visited an up-town hardware store the other day. "That lady," said the proprietor after her departure, "is an actress, and is just going on the road. All theatrical people, while traveling, carry nippers and tips with them. The managers of hotels in small towns try to save gas by putting bits of cotton in the bedroom burners, thus impeding the flow. The minute an actor strikes a light and detects this he pulls out his nippers and tips. Off comes the 'faked' burner and on goes one that lets the full head of gas come through. Before leaving he arranges things as he found them and goes merrily along to get the better of the next economical landlord on his route."—New York Sun.

Neither a Laddie Nor a Lassie.

A somewhat simple Scotchman, when taking his bairns to be baptized, usually spoke of them as laddies or lassies, as the case might be. At last his wife, possessed of the idea that the terms used were inelegant, said he must in the future say "infant."

The next time Sandy took another of his babies to be baptized, the minister asked: "Weel, Sandy, is it a laddie?"

"It's nae a laddie," was the answer.

"Then it's a lassie."

"It's nae a lassie," said Sandy.

"Weel, weel, mon, what is it then?" asked the surprised minister.

"I dinna remember vera weel," said Sandy, "but I think the gudewife said it was an illefant."—Spare Moments.

A Thrilling Experience.

Probably few men have had a more thrilling fifteen seconds or so than had the driver of a heavy load of giant powder in Oregon a few days ago. He was piloting a four-horse team drawing a wagon containing 3,000 pounds of giant powder over a rough road into Tillamook. A rickety bridge spanning a narrow ravine gave way under the load, and the whole outfit was dumped down into the dry bed of the creek. There was no explosion, and the driver, horses, wagon, and powder were hauled out all right. The driver has not recorded his sensation as he felt the bridge giving way and during the few seconds between then and the time the load landed safely again.

No Frank, No Clean Shirt.

There are not many men in public life who can put away the seductive pass and the insinuating telegraph frank. The delegate from, say, the Cherokee strip, (not Mr. Flynn, of Oklahoma), has just come into possession of a telegraph frank. He was relating its manifold and manifest advantages. "I can frank anything with it," said he. "Why, dang it all, "I'll frank my shirts home to be washed."

"But you can't. Shirts can't be sent by wire."

How to Throw a Horse and Kill Him.

There is a certain way that experienced stockmen know of throwing a horse down so as to break his neck and kill him at once. An ordinary halter is put on the horse, the lead strap from it passed between the horse's front legs, a turn being taken around the far one near the fetlock. The executioner then hits the horse a sharp cut with a whip, and when he jumps up pulls sharply and strongly on the halter strap. The horse strikes head first, with the entire weight on his neck. The fall is invariably fatal.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

No Room for Them.

Some years ago when Irving was playing "Faust" at the Lyceum, in the part of Mephistopheles, he descends through a trap-door in a cloud of flame; while doing so the trap jammed for some reason, and a voice from the "gods" immediately called out: "Hurrah, boys! Hell's full! There's no room for us;" Mephisto was forced to smile.

CONTENTMENT is a greater beautifier than any cosmetic.

Infinitesimal Sheet Iron.

The thinnest polished piece of iron ever made is said to be a sheet, 8x5½ inches in size, 1-4800 of an inch thick and weighing 46 grains, which was recently turned out at the Upper Forrest Tin Works, near Swansea, in Wales. There has been much competition between English, American, and French iron works in rolling iron paper since the first universal exhibition held in London in 1851, when a Pittsburgh firm sent a letter written on a sheet of iron which measured 1-1000 part of an inch.

Cheaper in the End.

Farmer Sassafras—What are you putting a barb-wire fence around your farm for? Isn't it awful expensive?

Farmer Meddergrass—Yes, the fence costs a heap o' money, but the hired men don't fool away any time sitting on it.—Exchange.

Cash vs. Spare Time.

To these classes especially we would say, if you wish to make several hundred dollars during the next few months write at once to B. F. Nervous Headaches

There are no people more miserable than those who suffer from this trouble, and there are none more happy than those who have been cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla. Read below:

"I personally recommend Hood's Sarsaparilla to my friends because it has been of great benefit to me. I have been suffering with dyspepsia and nervous headaches for several years. After using other preparations without success I concluded to try Hood's, and am pleased to say I have been benefited more by Hood's Sarsaparilla than by all other medicines combined. In fact, it has cured me. I have also used it as a blood purifier with marked success, and I

"German Syrup"

I am a farmer at Edom, Texas. I have used German Syrup for six years successfully for Sore Throat, Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Pains in Chest and Lungs and Spitting-up of Blood. I have tried many kinds of Cough Syrups in my time, but let me say to anyone wanting such a medicine—German Syrup is the best. We are subject to so many sudden changes from cold to hot, damp weather here, but in families where German Syrup is used there is little trouble from colds. John F. Jones.

Biliousness, Poor Digestion, Loss of Appetite.

DEAR SIRS:—"I have been troubled with Torpid Liver for 14 years and gone through courses of bilious fever; many times it has been impossible for me to do any kind of labor. Dr. Kilmer's SWAMP-ROOT was first recommended to me by Holthouse, Blackburn & Co., (Druggists) Decatur, Ind. Non-pull-out is an arbitrary word used to designate the only bow (ring) which cannot be pulled off the watch.

Here's the idea

The bow has a groove on each end. A collar runs down inside the pendant (stem) and fits into the grooves, firmly locking the bow to the pendant, so that it cannot be pulled or twisted off.

It positively prevents the loss of the watch by theft, and avoids injury to it from dropping.

IT CAN ONLY BE HAD with Jas. Boss Filled or other watch cases bearing this trade mark—

All watch dealers sell them without extra cost.

A watch case opener will be sent free to any one by the manufacturers.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Auburn in 1874 had established a reputation as a place of growing importance. Its inherent and lately acquired advantages had become somewhat known and it had entered upon a new life which offered inducements to people of two classes—those seriously desirous of bettering their condition and correspondingly helping the town, and those who sought by speculative projects solely to enrich themselves.

Slowly, yet surely the metropolis of the county in theory, had begun to gain up on its old-time rival and become the metropolis in fact. Its advances, owing to the efforts of the classes named, for the first and only time in its history, went beyond safety and partook of a boom character and so marked a brief period of spasmodic effort and unwholesome enterprise. This was exhibited in building for prospective tenants and platting unrequired additions. As a result, landlords sought and, not always, found paying tenants; the latter dictated rents, sales became exceptional, and what were intended for occupied lots reverted to fields for cultivation.

There was strong, unwavering faith in Auburn's future, and this firm confidence largely enhanced credit. When the school enumeration was taken in May by Wyllys Griswold, the census of the town, as accurately reported by him, was 1,611 persons—an increase well calculated to fill the popular mind with gratification and renewed hopefulness.

At this time there did exist a demand for building lots for homes and for business sites, and there were numerous persons who desired to purchase both improved and unimproved property. Forty houses were in course of erection in the month of May, and towards the close of the year, the north part of town had taken the lead in building. Many houses received additions and thirty-one new residences were under headway.

A number of well-to-do farmers moved in and others were preparing to follow their example. Auburn has ever presented many attractions as a home for this worthy class, who, feeling the infirmities of advanced age, long for rest and society.

Opportunities were presented to gratify inclination when on each Saturday the street was thronged with old neighbors come to enjoy a weekly half holiday and do their trading at store and grocery; when court sessions bring together juries, witnesses and interested friends from all parts of the county, and when occasions like Old Settlers' Day, Fourth of July, a big circus, or a political demonstration bring together beneath the shade of the court house park, men, women and young people by thousands.

As an indication of the extent to which pioneer farmers had, in 1874, located in Auburn, an actual count gave fifty-two persons who had then made this their permanent residence

Enterprise rightly directed reaped fitting reward. Some sought work at trade and some at manual labor; some looked for homes and there were those intent and on the lookout for, chances of speedy gain.

The resident of a small house near the Eel River depot had eighteen boarders and one safely venturesome individual built nine dwellings and sold them as soon as completed.

The town filled up its vacant places and expanded its limits. J. Rainier laid out an addition of forty lots at the north end and placed them on the real estate market at reasonable prices; Brandt and Ashley platted additions to the west, north of present school grounds, and Ensley and Stamets did the same to the south, to make rapid and remunerative sales.

Under the stimulus of active demand, prices of real estate within the corporation greatly advanced and some eligible properties had more than doubled in value. The question was not "What will you give?" but "What will you take for your property?" Had the owners of lots and lands who were unable or not desirous of building upon them, been willing to sell to those who were able and anxious to erect houses and blocks, they would have realized more than their property was worth, and the town of Auburn would have soon borne a different aspect.

But there were a few who would not sell unless for a ransom, and the years passing, they have lived to regret a lost opportunity. For years, vacant lots on which stood dilapidated houses surrounded by fruit trees or devoid of vegetation, located upon our principal streets, were interspersed among well improved propeaties and lingered long to illustrate backward tendencies in the most progressive communities.

Some owners of farm land contiguous to the corporation refused extravagant offers and would-be manufacturers were driven to seek sites for plants elsewhere,

The tide in the affairs of Auburn had come, but in some vital points it was not taken at its flood and it lost much that would in turn have secured more and given the town a prestige and a standing that would, at least, have advanced its growth and reputation far beyond even its present enviable and substantial position. All honor to those who improved the ripe opportunity and materially contributed to insure their own prosperity and made possible the progression that has placed Auburn among the leading towns of Northern Indiana.

With lapse of years, changes of sentiment have transpired relative to some of the minor matters which serve to show personal taste and public preference.

It was with extreme difficulty that reluctant lot owners could be induced to build even a four-foot oak sidewalk the length of their lots, and it was deemed a subject of congratulation when a pine board, six foot walk was added to the improved walks of the town. All sorts of expedients were resorted to in the line of economy. Walks were patched, boards were reversed, and strips nailed to secure loose boards, but the town narrowly escaped suit for damages from injuries occasioned by defective walks. Then came a party who advocated a tar walk, and the air was thick with the fumes of the material prepared for the purpose. Dr. Allen, D. D. Moody, Yesbera, Ralston and many others gave this material a trial, but all gave way in beauty and permanence to the cement walks now so numerous and which are a pleasure to the pedestrian and an advertisement of the town to the many strangers who travel them to and from the railroad stations.

It was popular in 1874 to have property enclosed, and not only fenced, but with material in keeping with the new life of the town. There was more fence building this year of which we write than there had been at any previous season and favorable public notice stimulated laudable competition.

One of the neatest fences was built by J. W. Shaffer on South Main street. J. H. Ford put up a fine, durable iron fence before his uptown residence, and Messrs. Beugnot, Berry, Snyder and Eldridge followed his example with costly iron fences at later periods. Attention was attracted to the neglected condition of the new cemetery and by the contribution of the many, a fine iron fence intended to protect and ornament the grounds was put up a few years ago.

The lawn mower had not been invented save in cumbrous form and the scythe was relied upon to remove the growth of grasses. With improved machines cheapened by competition, grass plats from private ownership to courtyard have been kept in order, and even the street, as in the case of Eldridge and Bowers, has been included in personal supervision.

It was in 1886, that a spirit of fence removal pervaded the people, and this cheap, economical improvement has done away with many a time worn, dilapidated fence and contributed to the better look of property.

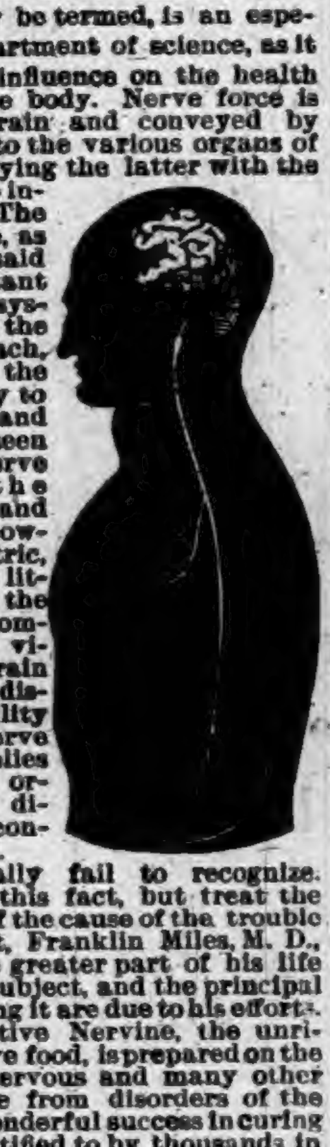
The Human Electrical Forces!

How They Control the Organs of the Body.



The electrical force of the human body, as the nerve fluid may be termed, is an especially attractive department of science, as it exerts so marked an influence on the health of the organs of the body. Nerve force is produced by the brain and conveyed by means of the nerves to the various organs of the body, thus supplying the latter with the vitality necessary to insure their health. The pneumogastric nerve, as shown here, may be said to be the most important of the entire nerve system, as it supplies the heart, lungs, stomach, bowels, etc., with the nerve force necessary to keep them active and healthy. As will be seen by the cut the long nerve descending from the base of the brain and terminating in the bowels is the pneumogastric, while the numerous little branches supply the heart, lungs and stomach with necessary vitality. When the brain becomes in any way disordered by irritability or exhaustion, the nerve force which it supplies is lessened, and the organs receiving the diminished supply are consequently weakened.

Physicians generally fail to recognize the importance of this fact, but treat the organ itself instead of the cause of the trouble. The noted specialist, Franklin Miles, M. D., LL. B., has given the greater part of his life to the study of this subject, and the principal discoveries concerning it are due to his efforts.

Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine, the unrivaled brain and nerve food, is prepared on the principle that all nervous and many other difficulties originate from disorders of the nerve centers. Its wonderful success in curing these disorders is testified to by thousands in every part of the land.

Restorative Nervine cures sleeplessness, nervous prostration, dizziness, hysteria, sexual debility, St. Vitus dance, epilepsy, etc. It is free from opiates or dangerous drugs. It is sold on a positive guarantee by all druggists, or sent direct by the Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind., on receipt of price, $1 per bottle, six bottles for $5, express prepaid.

A WEEK IN A BUSY CITY

FORT WAYNE.

The Commercial Center of Northern Indiana and the Second City of the State.

A City Not Lacking in Its Proportion of Wide-Awake and Enterprising Dealers.

Splendid Public and Private Buildings, Magnificent Stores, Large and Well Selected Stocks.

THE LEADERS.

The visitor who has an eye to the commercial facilities of the city he inspects is at once upon his arrival at Fort Wayne made cognizant of the energy and enterprise of its business men, and the appreciation thereof shown by the citizens generally.

Disembarking from a train at any of the depots, all of which are located in the heart of the city, the impression produced by the activity on the streets, the many fine business structures, the handsome stores and numerous manufacturing establishments which every reader in our little city, and in fact throughout the United States know, gives employment to thousands of people, proves Fort Wayne to be a city of "Hustlers" (to use a coarse but expressive term) and as full of energy as any city in the land. Some of Indiana's cities boast of their conservatism, but in these days of enterprise that term includes inactivity, sleepiness, and a general unwillingness to welcome any new enterprise, or patronize it if established. In fact there are too many cities in Indiana afflicted by this chronic affection, and when one arrives in a city such as Fort Wayne, which is not languid with "conservatism," an idea is formed of how towns and cities attain wide-spread fame. Fort Wayne is a city to which every resident of the State can point with pride. But by non-conservatism is not meant a heedless recklessness in public or private expenditures, the "leap before you look" method, nor the encouragement of "booms" which temporarily give a false high value and bring disaster in their train. By it and in its application to Fort Wayne is meant rather the honest pride taken by its people in their city's prosperity, their cordial welcome to every undertaking that adds to their city's good repute, the absence of business jealousy and the non-existence of fear lest the new coming enterprise should lessen the profits of the monopoly, or older establishments in the same line of business. "Room and welcome for all" and "Live and let live" are the legends lived up to by the people of this enterprising city.

AS A COMMERCIAL CENTER

Fort Wayne is yearly becoming more noted as one of the best points for business in the State. And a visit on an average day will readily convince any one of the truth of this assertion. Its business thoroughfares as well as its magnificent stores, are densely packed with people, many of whom are those who reside beyond what would naturally be regarded as its trade radius, however, they go there to lay in their supplies. A fact creditable to the business tact, energy and enterprise of its leading merchants who by fair dealing, strict attention to business and constant advertising have developed a trade of magnificent proportions and have helped to cultivate a healthy tone to the entire business of the city. We were surprised to learn on our tour through the city that a number of its business houses were established thirty, forty, and several more than a half century ago. They have survived all the storms of financial peril and business depression and to-day stand more firmly established than ever. Younger firms, many of whose members have had their business training with the older ones have been established later and all are generally doing a successful and prosperous business. Failures in the legitimate trade of Fort Wayne have been few and far between. The tricksters in trade come and go. Soon after there arrival there, they learn that it is not a healthy atmosphere for their methods, and take their departure for pastures green, or to some place where the business tone is on a less elevated plane than in Fort Wayne. The establishments visited during our sojourn in the city, and to which we refer in detail in another part of our paper, are the leaders in the several branches, and may well be termed palaces of trade. In the elaborateness of details of their salesrooms, their magnificent display windows, and large plate glass fronts, they would be a credit to the largest cities in the country.

There are in the city of Fort Wayne some of the handsomest and most thoroughly equipped dry goods and millinery houses to be found anywhere. Their stocks embrace every article woman can want, whether for personal adornment or household use. Of equal importance with these caterers to the feminine needs are the clothing and furnishing goods merchants. In attractions, extent and quality of stocks Fort Wayne clothing houses will compare favorably with those of any other city in the land. Subsidiary to this business and of equal importance to the masculine world are the furnishing goods, hats and merchant tailoring lines. No less important than the lines above mentioned is that of boots and shoes and in this enterprising city are establishments that carry full and complete stocks from which selections can be made to as good advantage as at any point in the United States. Fort Wayne in addition to the lines mentioned has musical emporiums handling large stocks of musical merchandise of all kinds, hardware stores, jewelry stores, furniture stores, carrying immense stocks of the best grades of goods, crockery stores, drug stores, numerous groceries, extensive dealers in carriages, wagons, harness, agricultural implements, and of course a large number of other branches such as are always to be found clustered in a large trading center. In conclusion it must be said with truth that as a trading point no city in the country can boast advantages superior to those centered in Fort Wayne, the metropolis of Northern Indiana.

The firms briefly noticed in our columns are recognized as the leaders of trade in the city, and their facilities for doing business are not excelled by those of any place. Our readers will find them strictly reliable and well worthy of all patronage extended to them.

THE CLOTHING TRADE

SAM, PETE & MAX

A House that Is Familiar to All, and One of the Leaders in the State.

A few years ago, comparatively it was not an easy matter to purchase good and cheap ready-made clothing. But with the advancement made in manufacturing the clothing business has kept apace, and where thirty years ago their sale was confined to a very small compass, to-day it has become one of the most important industries. This revolution is due to the fact that the most fashionable fabrics are used and the suits are cut and made up in the latest style. In Fort Wayne, as in all prominent commercial centers, we find concerns making a specialty of various lines of trade, and their names and business have become so conspicuous as to be familiarly known even beyond the bounds of the State. An illustration of this fact is found in the Sam, Pete, & Max clothing house, No. 58 Calhoun street. Who is it among our readers that has ever visited the city and not heard of it? We will venture to say there is not one. This house has been prominently identified with this branch of trade for nearly thirty years and enjoys the distinction of being one of the leaders in the State. Each year has added to its prosperous business until it has attained colossal proportions. This is not a mere accident, but the result of careful, persistent effort to supply the very best goods for the least money. An inspection of the establishment which covers three floors, each having the dimensions of 28x175 feet, provided with every requisite for the convenience of patrons, elegantly furnished and adorned with magnificent plate glass front reveals the fact that it is filled to overflowing with a stock of clothing largely from the finest productions of American and foreign looms which are made with skill and care. We found fine dress suits in Prince Albert and cutaway coats made in the latest styles of the best materials, the products of the most noted manufacturers. The ever serviceable business suits with sack coats in Scotch, English and American fabrics; also a line for old gents' wear, in quiet, sober colors. A large assortment of single garments—pants, vests and coats—composed of fashionable materials. The next to be seen was an immense stock of fall and winter overcoats in various styles and materials in light and dark colors, and with the best quality of linings. Passing over to the children's suit department we were, indeed, surprised to see such an immense assortment, and to learn how cheaply they are offered. These goods, we were informed by Mr. Mautner, are largely the product of Smith, Gray & Co., who are justly noted over the entire United States as manufacturers of the finest goods in this direction.

From the large stock of clothing here carried any form can be fitted, from the child 4 years old to the largest man, and while all are made to fit the form perfectly, the workmanship is excellent, which is a commendable feature. Hats and caps of all styles are here in stock—the nobby derby and soft hats for young men, and the genteel hats for elderly gentlemen. Also a stock of children's and boys' hats. The furnishings goods department is replete with all the latest novelties in neckwear, ties, collars, cuffs, shirts, hosiery, handkerchiefs, and gloves of all kinds, and from the finest wool to the cashmere and balbriggan and the heavy-weight underwear. In fact, everything used in the make-up of a gent's toilet except shoes can be had here. When in Fort Wayne call.

THE BEE HIVE

In the Front Among the Most Popular and Attractive Dry Goods Emporiums in the Summit City.

What Is to Be Seen There for Fall Wear.

One week in the beautiful and busy city of Fort Wayne has given your correspondent an opportunity of learning more of life and as to how business is conducted in the larger and more progressive centers than years spent in his quaint little native city of the East. The people of this section are to be congratulated, and should feel proud of the Summit City, for nowhere is there a more beautiful place, or a more wide-awake, genial and accommodating set of business men than those with which he came in contact during his brief sojourn there, and which every reader who is familiar with the city knows to be a fact. Many of you, we are aware, visit the city frequently, while others only do so at intervals; but no matter how frequent your visits may be we wish to say do not fail to call to the "Bee Hive Dry Goods House" of M. Frank & Co., 60 Calhoun street, which at any time is one of the city's most attractive emporiums and this fall especially so, on account of the magnificent display and immense assortment of goods of both foreign and home production now exhibited there, and which were selected with the greatest care in the Eastern markets by Mr. Frank himself. One of the old school, thorough-going merchants, who possesses a practical knowledge of every detail of the dry goods business, and with an honorable record of thirty-five years before the people of this community has become perfectly familiar with the requirements of the best classes of trade. Their premises covering three floors of 25x175 feet each, are equipped with every convenience, and adorned with magnificent plate glass windows and stocked to overflowing with the latest and finest in dress goods, of all fabrics, the stock of silks and trimmings being especially large. In cloaks and furs the assortment are truly great and includes everything from the finest cloth and seal skin wrap to the ordinary coat for daily wear. In carpets and upholstery the stock is an entirely new one and embraces the choicest materials and most select patterns. In fine linens and household goods the stock is unsurpassed. They are the agents for the Butterick patterns, sole agents in Fort Wayne for the Trelousse kid gloves, the celebrated Crescent hosiery, and the Majesty corset. We are pleased to commend this extensive house, where everything desirable in the dry goods line can be found, and in conclusion say that none are more popular than the old reliable "Bee Hive."

S. BASH & CO.

And the Mayflower Mills.

S. Bash & Co. Are No Doubt the Largest Produce and Commission Merchants in Northern Indiana.

Their specialties are Wool, Furs, Hides, Peltries, Field Seeds in bulk, also a full line of all country produce, which they both buy and sell and handle on commission. Parties desiring to buy or sell anything in the produce line will do well to write or see them personally before making arrangements to purchase or consign any kind of farm produce.

The Mayflower Mills is also a recent departure in which Messrs. S. Bash & Co. are largely interested. This is one of the most complete flouring mills that has ever been erected in Indiana and is fitted out with the most perfect machinery for milling work.

A few lines from the Western Trade Journal, one of the most prominent trade papers in the United States, will give an idea of the estimation in which their produce is held.

OUR DAILY BREAD.

RESULTS OF TESTS MADE IN THE INTERESTS OF RETAIL DEALERS AND THEIR PATRONS.

FANCY "VIENNA" PATENT FLOUR, THE PRODUCT OF THE MAYFLOWER MILLS, FORT WAYNE, TAKING THE LEAD.

Considering the widespread adulterations of food products, it is a pleasure indeed to be able to bestow unstinted praise upon these goods, and to commend them to the trade and public as being thoroughly pure and high grade in all respects.

As in all cases affecting the food supply, a crucial investigation was made in conformity with our usual methods and the result has been eminently creditable to this product, for its purity is established beyond question by severest test of a chemical laboratory unusually well equipped, and moreover, our test kitchen demonstrates its highest excellence in all essential features.

The samples tested were purchased in open market, being identical with goods supplied consumers, and the intelligent reader will readily discriminate between such real test and the paid analysis of so-called "experts," who furnish reports to suit the manufacturer patronizing them. This paper recognizes no interests save those of the dealers who prefer to handle pure goods and the public which seeks protection from adulterated and dangerous food products.

Possessing unexcelled facilities for arriving at the truth, we test everything that is advertised, reporting just what we find. In this case the result shows that better or purer goods are not to be found in the market. They are such as the honest retailer can handle and recommend to his trade with perfect confidence in their superior worth, and the public can use with entire safety and satisfaction. They are absolutely pure and beyond adverse criticism.

A BRIEF SKETCH

ON DENTISTRY.

Its Value and Importance.

United States Dental Association.

Under Skilled Management and Enjoying a Large Patronage.

There is nothing in science, art, or mechanism that has made more rapid progress than dentistry. And besides the many prominent master minds of this profession, the people of our day are better informed on this subject, which shows that they are interested and have a better conception of its vital importance than those of former years. There is nothing that disfigures the features to such an extent as poor teeth, and aside from their attractions they are the most useful organs and should be kept in perfect order as they are the most essential factors in preparing our food. The constant breathing of the putrid particles into the lungs to be absorbed into the blood tends to poison the whole system. The inflammation to which diseased teeth give rise are the causes of many facial deformities severe headaches, ear-aches, and affections of the eyes and stomach, which are treated in vain so long as the cause is not suspected. The aid of teeth in assisting vocalization—distinctiveness of utterance—is another plea for their preservation. Next in order after the preservation of the natural teeth comes a substitute which will supply the loss of the natural organs. Their substitutes—artificial teeth—should be constructed in a manner so as to strengthen the muscles of the face, in order to restore the natural expression of the features. The color, size, and shape of the teeth used should be suited to the complexion and features they are intended for. To accomplish these ends the artistic eye of the dentist should take the details into consideration and combine art with mechanism. It is estimated that now 25,000,000 of teeth are lost annually in the United States through improper care. With this deplorable fact staring us in the face it should awaken a still greater interest on the part of our people for their preservation. A good dentist is often the best friend to health as well as to beauty. Among those who have honorable records and is meeting with unprecedented success is Dr. J. W. Thompson of the United States Dental Association No. 9, East Wayne street. The Doctor is a graduate of the Baltimore College of Dental Surgery, and has had eight years of continuous practice, and came to Fort Wayne in March of this year and opened his present office. While he has ever advocated saving the natural teeth of the first importance, he has also made every detail pertaining to mechanical dentistry a study and kept pace with the great advancement made in this art which has secured for him a large patronage not alone from the best citizens of Fort Wayne but from all sections of Northern Indiana. In operative dentistry his work denotes artistic skill of the highest order. In filling a cavity, or building up from the root where the crown has been almost if not entirely destroyed the shape of the natural organ is exactly imitated, durably and smoothly finished. His plate work is also noticeable, and for beauty, artistic workmanship, and perfection of natural results commends itself. In all of his plate work there is symmetry and adaptability suited to the features of the patients which shows that he makes a study of these points, always making it a rule to learn the wants of his patient. He makes thin flexible rubber plates which are strong and durable; gold-lined rubber plates, noted for their lightness; alluminum and gold plates, or teeth without plates. In fact, he is competent to put up a set of teeth on any base desired or execute artificial work of any description. In extracting teeth he is careful and expert, and when an anæsthetic is desired uses vitalized air manufactured daily by himself, and on account of its purity can be administered to sickly or nervous people without the least harm. His reception room is luxuriantly furnished and his operating rooms pleasant and supplied with the latest improved chairs and instruments, while the laboratory is fitted up with the best facilities for doing mechanical work, and it is here where the best sets of teeth are made for $8.00, while a good set can be procured for $5.00 and partial sets $2.00 and upwards. In operative dentistry his prices are equally moderate. Gold fillings, $1.00 and up, silver, 75c., amalgam, 50c. Extracting, 25c. Dr. Thompson employs an able assistant and all are kept constantly busy, and every piece of work executed is guaranteed. He is a pleasant and agreeable gentleman to meet, and one who is posted in the advancement of dental knowledge.

A NAME FAMILIAR TO ALL

MORGAN & BEACH.

A Firm Handling Some of the Finest Goods Manufactured in Fancy Hardware; and Agents for the Best Plate and Ornamental Glass Productions.

Few, indeed, is the number among the readers of our paper who are not familiar with the name of Morgan & Beach, a firm which is one of the most enterprising in the busy city of Fort Wayne. It is almost needless to mention, for every one knows, that their business embraces the handling of hardware in both a retail and wholesale way; and occupying as they do a most conspicuous position among the best and strongest concerns engaged in this branch of trade, it would only be natural their establisment be among the first we visit. To one who is an admirer of a beautiful and systematically arranged mercantile emporium, a visit to their store, at Nos. 19 and 21 East Columbia street, will certainly be a treat. The building, in the first place, ranks as one of the most substantial business blocks in the city, and has a frontage of 40 feet on Columbia street and extends back 110 feet. It has a splendid basement and is four stories in height. There are two large entrances from Columbia street with immense plate glass windows on either side, in which is artistically arranged a display of many of the fine goods handled by the firm. Upon entering at either of these entrances, we have stretched before us one of the most magnificent hardware stores in the State, a statement which none will dispute after a visit. After surveying the main salesroom, you can take a speedy elevator to three floors above, all of which are packed to repletion with a heavy stock of goods, and so systematically arranged that any article desired can be found at a moment's notice. During our visit we were shown one of the most elaborate stocks of shelf and fancy hardware we have ever seen, and which embraced the products of the world renowned P. and F. Corbin Co., and Harvard Lock Co.'s goods, which are finished in gold, silver, old copper, and Bower-Barff; such goods, in fact, as we thought were only carried by the larger establishments in the metropolitan commercial centers, but are such of course as are in demand in all growing centers where fine dwellings are being erected. The next shown to surprise us was the stock of heavy plate beveled and stained, or ornamental glass. It is well known to all of our readers that the charm of a painted window is one which has been appreciated since window glass was first produced. Yet the great expense of this kind of ornamentation restricted it to churches and the dwellings of only the wealthiest. That this objection has been overcome, it is only necessary for any reader who doubts this assertion to call on this firm and be convinced that designs in all colors and tints can now be supplied suitable for dwellings, churches, public buildings, or for windows where the outlook is unattractive at the most reasonable prices, at such prices in fact that are within the reach of any builder. Morgan & Beach carry a large assortment which can be made to fit an shape or size of window. Or again should any special design be required they can furnish them to order on the shortest notice, as they are the manufacturers' agents for this district. Readers of our paper who require such articles as above mentioned, which are not carried by our dealers should call on or correspond with this firm where they can rely on getting reliable goods and honorable treatment.

NOVELTIES FROM ABROAD

At No. 8 West Columbia Street.

H. N. Ward's name is a household word, and the celebrated dog that stands watch in front of his crockery store is alike famous. Mr. Ward has something in store for his patrons and friends in the nature of a magnificent display of crockery, queensware, and the vast array of articles in his line. He has now en route here consignments from the leading manufacturers in France, Germany, England, and America. Mr. Ward spares no expense to lead the trade, and in a short time he will display to the public the most magnificent and costly line of crockery, queensware, and fancy articles ever looked at in the West. It is always a pleasure to note the success of a business house, but especially is it a pleasure to note the fact that Mr. Ward shows the people of Fort Wayne as fine a stock of goods as any house in the land.

THE RAPID RISE

Of the Chicago Furniture Company,

Now Located in New Quarters at 109 Calhoun Street.

ART IN HOUSE FURNISHINGS.

Art in house furnishing is as surely existing at the present time in this country as it was during the palmist days of ancient Athens, and only those who cater to modern cultivation, and evidence the highest degree of artistic taste combined with practical skill succeeded in the fierce completion that exists in this special line. We are aware that but few of our readers who are at all familiar with Fort Wayne have not heard of the Chicago Furniture Company which we are pleased to announce has scored an immense success and so completely had its business outgrown the capacity of its former building on East Columbia street, and so great was its need for more room that on September 1st the immense stock was removed to 109 Calhoun street, where they have five floors of 22x100 feet each in dimensions, and yet we may say they are greatly crowded. It was our pleasure to be in the city on the evening of this grand opening which attracted much attention and brought hosts of congratulations to its enterprising proprietor; and the multitudes of callers were all delighted with the almost fairy change. The stock here embraces everything in the line of handsome parlor, drawing and reception room, library, hall, dining and chamber suites in all the very latest and most desirable styles made of the different woods, as well as polished brass and upholstered in the richest and most unique styles, and which are representative of the productions of the most celebrated manufacturers of the country. An excellent line of sofas, conversation chairs, buffets, couches, folding beds, rockers, leather covered suites and kitchen furniture is likewise carried; and the stock of bedding materials comprises mattresses of all styles, pillows, and in fact all the adjuncts of a perfect bed. Four floors of the immense building is devoted to the display of furniture, and all of which are reached by an elegant passenger elevator. On the second floor we find the carpet department. "Immense" is the word to apply to this stock, "great" the word to apply to the variety. They have them from the domestic rag article adored by our grandparents on up through the different gradations of ingrain and Brussels of the finest designs and colorings to the most superb and heaviest Wiltons. All designs, all textures, all combinations, all qualities are there, together with a complete line of rugs, mattings, stair rods, carpet sweepers and carpet store sundries as well. The stock in its several departments exceeds in quality and variety anything we have ever seen and certainly cannot fail to delight those who wish to furnish and beautify their homes.

AMERICA

Pre-eminently a Country of Homes.

Their Interior Decorations Render Them Generally Very Pleasing and Cheerful.

Mantels, Grates and Tiles Are Necessary Requisites.

There is nothing that attracts the attention or is more surprising to our foreign friends when they pay this country a visit than our homes, and all declare emphatically that no nation on the face of the globe is better housed than the American people. America is pre-eminently a country of homes. Our residences are notable for architectual beauty and taste in design and to few features in these days of highly developed taste in the beautiful and artistic is more interest attached than to their interior decoration, and what adds more to the attractiveness, or lends more cheer to a room than a beautiful mantel and a hearth laid with high art tile? The advance made in the production of these articles within comparatively recent years would no doubt surprise the most of our readers. It is, therefore, gratifying for your correspondent to call their attention to the influential and old established firm of Carter & Son, No. 29 Clinton street, who carry one of the best selected and most extensive stocks of fine hardwood, slate, marble and other mantels, high art tiles of all descriptions, for hearths, mantel facings, wainscoating, and all kinds of interior decorations, as well as plain tiles for floors; also grates for natural gas, wood, or coal, brass goods, and all fire-place appurtenances which are sold at remarkably low prices. They likewise are the agents for the celebrated Prize furnaces, together with other noted brands, which are adapted to the use of gas or coal, and possess such excellent qualities that house-keepers in adopting their use will add largely to the comforts of home. This business dates its inception back thirty years by the senior Mr. Carter, who in the interval has executed many contracts in his special line throughout Northern Indiana and adjoining States to which he can point with pride. Their premises embrace three floors of 22x60 feet each in dimensions. So artistically is everything arranged that it is indeed a most pleasing place to visit. Public and private buildings are supplied with mantels, wainscoting, tiling of all kinds and furnaces. None but experts are employed in putting out their beautiful work, and those of our readers who enter into contracts with them rely implicitly on receiving the best and by calling to their store can now see in large assortment the very newest designs and latest styles in art tiles and mantels.

LADIES!

To Be Beautiful Is to Be Loved.

If You Desire a Beautiful Complexion We Commend the Articles Manufactured by the Union Manufacturing Co., No. 21 Arcade Building.

The ladies love to be beautiful, because, many other things being equal, "To be beautiful is to be loved." All the ladies of our community as well as all sections of Northern Indiana, are beautiful, of course, everybody knows that. The city of Fort Wayne is noted for its many beautiful ladies, of which fact your correspondent was aware from personal observation during previous visits. This trip, however, they seemed more beautiful than ever. But how did it happen? was the question that puzzled him as well as other visitors. But the truth, like murder, always will out, and a few days ago when strolling through the Arcade, he noticed a handsomely furnished suite of parlors and upon the glass door was written in gilt letters, "Union Manufacturing Co." He entered, and there met Madame Pierce, who was in charge, and there and then discovered the cause of this change in appearance of so many ladies which is due to the use of several preparations, discovered and manufactured by this concern, and which are daily becoming more popular and in more extensive demand in all sections of the State. The first we were shown was "Liquid Rose Leaves" for tinting the cheeks and lips, a lasting and perfectly harmless preparation which is composed of the very purest ingredients, and its effect is, indeed, great. Another is the "Magic Beautifier," a preparation for the complexion which will rapidly and permanently remove, tan, freckles, pimples, blackheads, chapped or rough skin. The "Magic Beautifier" can be safely used by the most delicate skin, which it not only softens but also beautifies. "Magic Curline" is a liquid preparation for the hair, which by its use is rendered soft and glossy and saves the daily use of a curling iron, in fact twice a week is deemed sufficient by the majority of the ladies who are using it. In addition to the above mentioned they also manufacture "Enameline" an unequalled polish for fine furniture, pianos, etc. Another product of this company is the "Electric Carpet Cleaner," the name of which indicates its mission. It is intended as a renovator for carpets and rugs and has proved in the highest degree its efficiency. It not only thoroughly cleanses, but restores the color and is a great labor saver, the work can be done in one-quarter of the time and without removing carpets from the floor. Those of the Hotel Randall and Hotel Plaza have been thoroughly renovated by this process, also those of a number of private residences in the city, and all speak in the highest terms of the work. The Union Manufacturing Co. is reliable and worthy of trust and confidence. They guarantee their products and want agents and dealers in all sections of the State to handle their goods for which the demand will increase as their merits become better known. We think it proper to add their prices for the convenience of many who probably would desire to have goods sent by mail and which will be cheerfully done on receipt of price, which will be per bottle as follows: "Liquid Rose Leaves," 50 cents; "Magic Beautifier," 75 cents; "Curline," 50 cents; "Enameline," 50 cents, and "Electric Carpet Cleaner," 75 cents per gallon, which will thoroughly clean twenty-four yards of any grade of carpet. Those of our lady readers who want profitable and pleasant employment cannot do better than write to this company, enclosing stamps for particulars.

WONDROUS ADVANCEMENT

Of the Past Few Years in the Dental Profession.

Dr. C. P. Tinkham,

One of Fort Wayne's Most Widely Known Representatives of the Profession.

There was a period in the history of this country when the science of dentistry involved an unusual amount of physical suffering on the part of those who were forced by the exigencies of the hour to seek relief by having the teeth extracted. This work largely devolved upon the physicians throughout the country, and as their instruments were of the most primitive make and their knowledge of the work to be performed limited, the victims who submitted to such an operation were at a loss to determine for several days following whether they were really dead or alive. Again, it was not many years since the work sent out by dentists was of the crudest character and a sore affliction to the person who sought renewed health by having their decayed teeth removed and replaced by new ones from the hands of the dentist. During your correspondent's sojourn in the busy city of Fort Wayne he heard much about Doctor C. P. Tinkham, the dentist whose handsome reception room and office is located at No. 18 and 20 Arcade. A few days ago while strolling through the Arcade he thought a visit to his dental parlors might prove interesting, as well as instructive. Fortunately it was one of the few times when the Doctor was disengaged. After introducing himself, as it had been his misfortune to have never had the pleasure of his acquaintance, he found him a very genial young gentleman and an instructive entertainer. Your correspondent being no different to the average newspaper man of course asked many questions and exhibited a desire to see how he was equipped. The Doctor readily noticed that our curiosity was aroused and at once proceeded to gratify it. The superior character of the work he turns out is indeed surprising. The variety and delicacy, yet strength of the instruments necessary to the practice of the profession, in fact all of the mechanical apparatus essential in perfecting first-class work were eloquent witnesses of the advancement in this science. The building up of solid teeth on old roots, and the famous bridge work, which enables him to supply beautiful teeth without plates are attainments of the present day that would have been ridiculed a few years ago. Another feature which shows the wondrous advancement in the science is painless dentistry. Extracting of teeth without pain being one of his leading specialties, and for this purpose uses Pain Annihilator, a preparation of his own, which he can guarantee to be perfectly harmless and can be used by the most nervous or sickly as well as the strongest patient. Of the hundreds who have given it a trial all are loud in their praise of its success, which we deem the best evidence. Doctor Tinkham is a native of Fort Wayne and is in consequence well known there, and is enjoying a lucrative practice which requires two assistants, both of whom are capable, and besides his large list of city patrons, many from neighboring cities and towns take advantage of his skill. He is a graduate of the of the Indiana Dental College of Indianapolis, and must be regarded as an expert in all branches of his profession, which is demonstrated by nothing so well as his success.

A WIDE-AWAKE CONCERN

Handling a Fine Line of Goods and Offering a Very Desirable Premium.

The Manufacturers' Shoe Company.

Although but a comparatively short period in existence, (since April 8th), the Manufacturer's Shoe Co. located at No. 25 Calhoun street, (Peter Kiser's old stand), has proved a success that attests the wisdom that inspired the venture, to say nothing of the energy and ability displayed in its management. It is in short, well worthy of attention from your correspondent in his savings of the representative headquarters of all lines in the Summit City, where quality and constituency are all fully in keeping with one another. This concern is under a management that in practical and sufficiently actuated with the spirit of the times to keep abreast in all that materially contributes to the convenience of the public and that ministers to the pleasure of the eye. This shoe house is commodious, covering two floors and basement of 22x60 feet each in dimensions and aesthetically considered lacks nothing to render it attractive throughout. The display of boots and shoes of every grade, in the large plate glass windows, on the shelves and counters, is really artistic in its beautiful and convenient arrangement, etc. An attempt to describe the contents of this emporium would be manifestly a failure, so lest the failure would be too glaring, the attempt will not be made. We will however say that nowhere can a more complete or finer stock of footwear be found, and nowhere are lower prices quoted. As an advertisement and a drawing card for trade this concern is now offering a beautiful pastel picture complete with gilt frame, and glass when goods to the amount of twenty-dollars have been purchased. This is certainly a most liberal offer and this grand prize should be seen by every one of our readers who visit Fort Wayne.

AN EXTENSIVE ESTABLISHMENT

Devoted to the Handling of Stoves and Kitchen Furnishings.

H. J. ASH,

The Leader of Northern Indiana.

Commercial enterprises of modern times embrace many features of practical utility, none, however, are more deserving of consideration than those which relate to the home, its comforts, and conveniences. Among such institutions in the city of Fort Wayne, it would have been a palpable oversight on the part of your correspondent had he failed to visit that of H. J. Ash, No. 16 East Columbia street, wholesale and retail dealer in stoves and kitchen furnishings. The premises he occupies embrace four floors of 20x150 feet each in dimensions, and is provided with every convenience and facility for the prosecution of the heavy business he is doing. In passing through his store, which is one of the most extensive devoted to this branch of trade in the State, and the largest we ever visited, we were not long in being convinced that in the manufacture of stoves America is ahead of all the world. Many of the stoves he handles are to be admired for their architectural designs, possessing as they do a beauty of form and ornamentation that would grace the finest room. But while success has been achieved in beauty of design, attractiveness of form has been subservient to their construction upon the best known scientific principles for increasing their utility and effectiveness. Among the brands which are familiar to most of our readers and for years have been appreciated by the public for their superiority is the Garland, and of which we noticed an unusually large stock. It is well known that they are great radiators of heat, economizers of coal and are easily controlled and in consequence it is easy to account for their popularity. But this is not the only brand to be found in his store, there are many, and all of which are the best produced in this country. These, together with gas grates, gas stoves of all kinds and the full line of kitchen furnishings which are there in almost endless variety place his establishment among the first in the State. Possessing every facility for the procurement of his goods from the leading manufacturers at the most advantageous rates puts Mr. Ash in a position to offer the trade such inducements as they cannot obtain elsewhere. We would advise our readers if their dealer is not handling any of his goods to send to, or call on him for prices, as all can certainly be suited from the immense stock he carries.

ARCHITECTURE

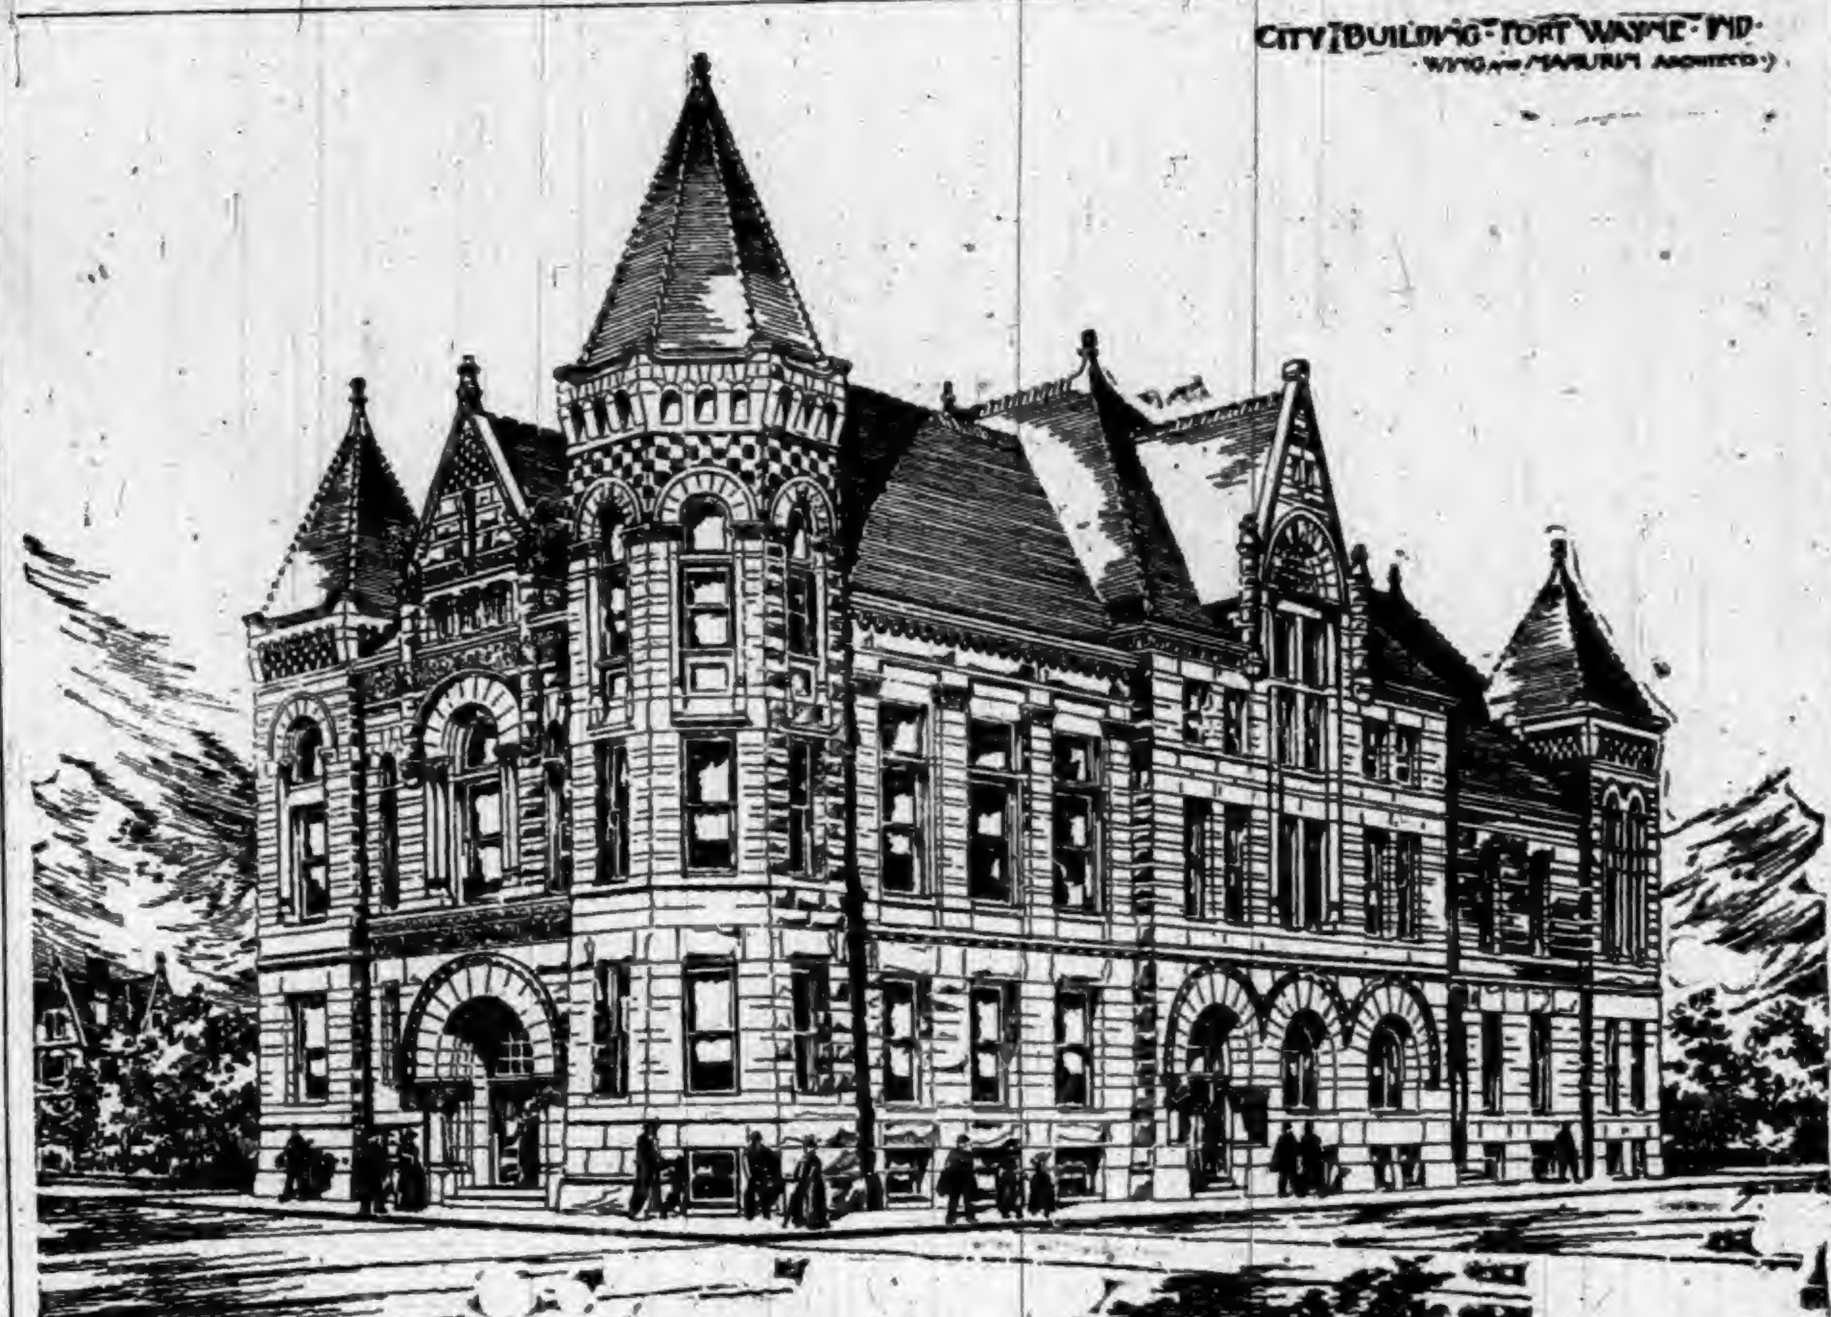
A Most Difficult Profession.

WING & MAHURIN.

A Firm That Enjoys a Widely Extended Reputation—Specimens of Their Skill to Be Seen Here and Elsewhere.

The visitor to the busy Summit City who would fail to observe that it has been a faithful field for the exercise of the highest order of talent in the line of modern architecture is certainly totally blind or a fit subject for an optician; for in every section are to be found edifices of beautiful design, remarkable proportions, and exceptional finish, which stand as monuments of skill and ability, and elicit the warmest commendations of the public and favorable opinions of critic and experts. In the possession of experts in this line Fort Wayne is specially fortunate, and among the leading and distinguished firms thus engaged is Wing & Mahurin (whose offices are located in the Pixley-Long Building) to whom your correspondent paid a visit during his sojourn in the city, which not only proved pleasant, but exceedingly instructive. It required no time to convince him that the profession of an architect was a very difficult one; requiring a great amount of study, a thorough scientific and mechanical training and a large practical experience to win success. Much less time did it require for him to learn that these essential requisites have been developed in a marked degree by these gentlemen who have for years devoted themselves to solving the complex problems of how to best utilize the minimum of building space with the maximum of accommodation, coupled with architectural beauty of design, excellence, and perfection of detail. Proof of their skill and ability is proven by the many fine edifices which they have designed in all sections of Indiana, adjoining States and the South, to which their reputation has extended and is established; while their worth, as architects can be pointed out in our own little city, as well as at their home, where they have erected some of the finest specimens of architecture to be seen. The Fort Wayne City Building, as shown in our paper of to-day, is a specimen of their work, which is conceded by those who have seen both the exterior and interior as one of the neatest, most convenient, and substantial of its kind they have ever visited.

In looking over and carefully studying some of the plans just completed, as well as visiting some of the buildings designed by them your correspondent was struck with the care they exercise to secure to the owner the best results, and, therefore, we are pleased to call our readers' attention to such sound, reliable, and responsible business men who are familiar with the requirements of every school of design. In conclusion we say to those contemplating the erection of a building, whether business block, factory, residence or public building, they will consult their own interests by calling and placing their orders with this firm, who are prompt in meeting every demand.



THE CONDITION

Of Affairs at a Popular Establishment.

Supplying the Trade of a Large Territory with Stylishly Made and Well Fitting Garments.

GLOBE CLOTHING HOUSE.

Trade is at flood tide at the popular Globe Clothing House, corner Calhoun and Main streets. Five salesmen and the two proprietors were as busy as bees whenever your correspondent called during business hours. To him it seems that their business at present is all they can look after, and yet when he considers that the fall trade has not as yet fairly opened, it would be hard for him to predict what they will do later in the season. It is one of the most extensive houses of Northern Indiana, and in its several years of association with the trade interests of Fort Wayne and community has secured a wide and growing popularity. The proprietors are keen, far-sighted men of business who are thoroughly versed in every detail relating to the undertaking they so ably control. They have demonstrated to the satisfaction of a large constituency that the very best fabrics are now used in ready-made garments; that they are made up and trimmed in the very latest styles, and for fit and workmanship are not to be surpassed by any merchant tailor. This fact is daily becoming more apparent to the people of Northern Indiana, and in consequence they are drawing a trade to their city which otherwise never would have gone gone there. Another fact is that they have a thoroughly established reputation for square dealing, and their name is synonymous for commercial integrity. Their patrons expect to get just what they call for, and find it safe to buy goods on this firm's guarantee, which they give with every purchase and which we think proper to quote: "All goods will be found as represented, or money refunded." What more could be demanded? It takes time to establish such a reputation as this firm has acquired, but when once gained it means life-long prosperity and pleasant intercourse between dealer and patron. Heller & Frankel have, since commencing business in Fort Wayne, devoted themselves to the upbuilding of confidential relations with their customers, and their upright methods of dealing has met its deserved reward. The Globe is in consequence everywhere recognized throughout the territory tributary to the Summit City, as an honorable house, and its trade is thereby enlarged and expanded. From the outset they have catered to the best trade in the line of clothing, and at all times keep just the goods this trade demands; and that too in large assortment. In fact, their stock of men's fine clothing is one of the largest in the city, and few similar houses in our metropolitan cities carry as fine assortment. This, however, can be accounted for and is owing to their being directly connected with one of the largest and most popular Eastern factories whose goods have become justly celebrated, and of course which product they handle and has assisted much in giving them the reputation they enjoy. In children's clothing they carry everything desirable, and in such immense variety that every taste can be suited. Bessemer suits in short pants with double knees and seat, together with other celebrated makes. They likewise carry in large assortment hats and caps and all the latest novelties in gentlemen's furnishings. Strictly one price and cash is the rule, and no effort is spared to please and satisfy both as to quality and price each and every one of the patrons of the "Globe."

A CREDITABLE INDUSTRY,

Enjoying a Patronage From all Over Northern Indiana, Northwestern Ohio and Southern Michigan.

TROY STEAM LAUNDRY.

Your correspondent, in his tours over the city of Fort Wayne, of course visited many institutions which were worthy of note. Among them was the above mentioned, which has not only long since attested its worth, but public confidence in the truth of the saying, "Cleanliness is next to godliness." The Troy is one of the most creditable laundry industries in the State and during the seventeen years since its inception it has gained a firm hold on public patronage. At the start a building of 16x30 feet was ample to meet all demands; in less than one year first-class work began to tell and this building was found inadequate and an addition was put thereto. From time to time the firm continued to make improvements until four years ago, its now splendid two-story brick building, 50x115 feet in dimensions, was completed and which is improved with the very latest machinery and every facility for the rapid and satisfactory disposition of the work to which it is adapted. The work is of the best quality, no chemicals are employed in the process, the purest filtered water, the very best quality of blue, and the purest of home-made soap are used, and the same care exercised in procuring the desired result as in the best regulated household. The work here turned out is finished with a medium gloss which is more elastic and preferable to the old fashioned high polish and hard finish, thereby prolonging the life of the linen. The Troy has a reputation for the excellent manner in which all work is done that extends far beyond the limits of Fort Wayne, and a large patronage is received from all sections of Northern Indiana, Northwestern Ohio, and Southern Michigan, where they have agencies established. This patronage from abroad as well as that from the city is rapidly increasing, and with the vast amount of labor saving machinery and the employment of sixty people they are prepared to fill orders from all sources promptly. They wish to secure a first-class agent in every town and city throughout the country tributary to Fort Wayne, and where no agency is located invite correspondence to that end. The Troy Steam Laundry is unquestionably the best equipped establishment of its kind we have ever visited, and in conclusion heartily commend its work to our readers.

INTERESTING

Was the Tour of Inspection Through the Magnificent House of

ROOT & COMPANY.

Almost immediately upon our arrival in this beautiful and busy city, we, like all visitors proceeded to take in Calhoun street, which no one will fail to recognize as the main business thoroughfare. After strolling some distance through the moving throng our attention was attracted to a massive building which bore the sign of Root & Company, dry goods and carpets. After carefully surveying the exterior with its immense modern plate glass windows, which might fittingly be spoken of as the "Mirrors of fashion," displaying samples of all new goods and styles, and forming an index to the vast stock within, we went to the lofty entrance with as much pleasure as though going to the Masonic Temple (Fort Wayne's leading theater) to hear some eminent actor, and glancing over the main salesroom which is planned after the ideas of the proprietors to secure vast floor space and an abundance of light and air, we inquired for Mr. E. C. Rurode who, in addition to being a member of the firm, exercises a general management of the business. But a short time elapsed until we met him, and much less time did it require for us to learn that this firm has not been identified with this branch of business over a third of a century without a thorough knowledge of the requirements of the trade. Our journey of inspection was started by going to the basement, which is of the same dimensions as the remaining four floors, 52x170 feet, and is utilized for the storage of surplus stock for both the wholesale and retail departments. Of course this place is not particularly interesting to the general reader, but it would open the eyes of any visitor as well as those of a newspaper man to see such an immense stock in reserve, and is certainly worthy of mention. Leaving this department we ascended to the main salesroom, which is equipped with every convenience for the manipulation and display of the immense stock and which is unquestionably one of the best and most conveniently arranged dry goods emporiums in the State, reflecting the highest credit on the proprietors. This floor is divided into appropriate departments, each keeping the different lines at the flood tide of completeness; and so far as the character of the stock is concerned it may be safely asserted that it is unsurpassed by any contempary concern, whether located here, or in the larger cities of this country, and embraces a diversity simply impossible to describe in silks and fall and winter dress goods, trimmings, laces, ribbons, ladies' furnishings, etc. Before proceeding further we think it proper to state, that in purchasing stock this firm selects it with a view to please those whose tastes run to the elegant; as well as those who think of their purses when they buy. This floor also contains departments devoted to linens, woolens, cottons, and mixed articles of every texture and description, fancy notions, housekeepers' goods, and in short every article that would be called for in any first-class dry goods emporium. The selections in every department have been made with judgment and taste and every phase of production is exhibited in its freshest and most attractive form. Taking the splendid passenger elevator we ascend to the second floor where is located the cloak, carpet, and fur departments in which they are the acknowledged leaders, and which add very materially to the general attractiveness of this mammoth establishment as a grand depot for supplies in the line of dry goods. In cloaks and wraps the richest garments are here exhibited in various fabrics, cut, made and trimmed in the highest style of the art, and will bear favorable comparison with the best custom made articles. In the fur department it will readily be determined by the most casual observer that this house in purchasing has special facilities and opportunities and the heavy stock there exhibited is remarkably varied and inviting and contains a full assortment of all the prevailing styles of these goods. Passing over to the carpet department we found it one with which no customer could fail to be pleased. The quality, designs and tints of many of these are excellent, forming in their combination a picture that an artist would appreciate, and much more those who wish to replenish their parlors and chambers with the latest in floor coverings. Again taking the elevator and ascending to the third and fourth floors, which are devoted exclusively to the wholesale departments, we find them equipped with every appliance and facility that capital, art and science can invent, and a stock of goods which in its varied assortment represents the choicest fabrics of this class of manufactures and is specially adapted to the wants of the retailer in all sections of the country tributary to Fort Wayne. In addition to this establishment they also conduct another at Terre Haute. Mr. L. B. Root, who is constantly in the New York market, is a keen judge and buys for cash to the best advantage for the two stores from the leading manufacturers, while their choicest silks, satins, velvets, etc., are of their own importation. In the retail department one hundred efficient and obliging salesmen and salesladies are employed; while in that devoted to wholesale are twenty-five, which includes four travelers, whose territory in addition to nearly every section of Indiana, includes all of Western Ohio and Southern Michigan. Taking the elevator from the fourth floor we descended to the main salesroom and proceed to the street, feeling satisfied that in visiting Root & Co.'s store, 46 and 48 Calhoun street, which is one of Fort Wayne's most interesting sights, we were amply repaid for our time. Before concluding, we however, think a few facts relative to their manner of doing business, as observed during our visit worthy of note. All customers are served alike impartially. All goods are sold on their merits, and we are safe in asserting, will be found exactly as represented. All orders, whether given in person or by mail, which is a specialty, receive the promptest attention and every effort is made to meet the demands of the patrons in the most satisfactory manner. Treating all courteously, carrying the finest grades of goods and selling them at the lowest prices consistent with quality, are features which has gained for this firm their immense trade and placed them in the front rank of the leading merchants of Indiana.

AMERICANS

The Largest Manufacturers and Consumers of Cigars in the World.

"B & O," "Golden Rule," and "New Fuss" Are Brands Which Are Among the Most Popular and Are in Increasing Demand.

The magnitude of the proportions which the consumption of tobacco has attained in this country, in the form of cigars especially, would seem to indicate a general belief in the saying: "He who smokes thinks like a philosopher." Every year the demand increases and the industry grows; and with Cuba as a source of supply we cannot fail to be the largest manufacturers and consumers of cigars in the world. Your correspondent was of course aware that Fort Wayne had its factories, yet, however, the thought never entered his mind that it possessed such an extensive concern as that conducted by Mr. Fred C. Boltz, No. 27 Calhoun street. He, like most of our readers, had heard of and smoked some of the brands which are here manufactured and which are recognized by judges as being among the finest and most pleasant on the market. Few is the number among our readers who are lovers of the weed that have not smoked the "B & O," which has been on the market since 1884, and maintains a stronger hold on popular favor with both the trade and consumer than any other cigar sold in Northern Indiana. In fact so popular is it and so great is the demand that the cigar dealer in Fort Wayne who fails to have it in his case, to use a slang phrase "is not in it." He also manufactures the "Golden Rule," which is a highly prized brand and is in constant and increasing demand. The "New Fuss," a five-cent cigar is unequalled anywhere for the money and like the "B & O" and "Golden Rule" should be found in the stock of every dealer throughout this vicinity. Mr. Boltz takes a great pride in the reputation he has gained for his goods, which has resulted from using the finest tobaccos obtainable, and through attention to the most minute details of their production. His motto is, "the best is the cheapest," and which has brought a trade to his house that extends all over Northern Indiana, Southern Michigan, and Western Ohio. In addition to manufacturing the above brands of cigars together with others that have also become very popular, he occupies a foremost rank among the wholesale liquor dealers of the State and has secured a large patronage from the leading hotels and bon-ton sample rooms within a radius of one hundred miles of the city. He carries a large and valuable stock of the most popular brands of champaignes and other effervescent and sparkling wines, mild clarets, ports, Burgundies, and still wines of every description from the most celebrated European and American vintages, as well as brandies, whiskies, rum, gin, etc. He has the exclusive agency for a number of the most popular brands of Kentucky bourbon's and Eastern ryes among which might be mentioned "Lime Stone," "S. O. Hackley," and "Keystone." In addition to the heavy stock carried in his store a large quantity of goods are kept in bond, and sales are made at the option of the buyer either duty free or in bond. Two traveling men are kept on the road whose labors are carefully supervised by the proprietor who in an enterprising and wide-awake merchant and whose reputation for producing superior cigars and handling the best brands of liquors challenges criticism.

"IMPERIAL CROWN"

Is the Purest Baking Powder on the Market.

"Elixir Bark and Iron," and "Beef Wine and Iron" Are Tonics Which Are Popular and in Extensive Demand.

Meyer Brothers & Company, established 1852, is the inscription engraved upon each of the two large, handsome and bright polished brass signs which mark the main entrance to their mammoth establishment, No. 2 Keystone Block. This house is one of those well-established and substantial concerns that does credit to the city of Fort Wayne and as druggists and chemists they have more than a State reputation. In consequence your correspondent is well aware that they need no introduction to our readers and will, therefore, call attention only to the several specialties above indicated which they manufacture, and which for reliability and superiority practically supplant all rival productions wherever introduced. The first is their "Imperial Crown" Baking Powder manufactured from the purest materials and by the most scientific processes, and is as pure as modern science can make it, being entirely free from the chemicals that make many of the baking powders now on the market absolutely dangerous to general health, if not to life itself. Your correspondent knows it be a fact that this powder is largely used by the people of Fort Wayne, which is the best praise it can receive. Among the number of remedies manufactured and whose virtues have been thoroughly tested and determined are "Elixir Bark and Iron" and "Beef Wine and Iron," tonics which have acquired a wide popularity, and are sold not only at home, but by all first-class druggists throughout the State. Insist upon having them when you need a tonic.

CHAMPION TAILORING CO.

An Enterprise of Recent Establishment in Fort Wayne Which Is Destined to Become a Leader.

The very marked improvement in male apparel of late years in this country is one of the notable features of these days of tasteful attire. Not only are the garments that leave a fashionable tailoring establishment cut upon scientific principles, but are made up and finished in a style utterly unknown a quarter of a century ago. Thoughts just noted are the result of a visit, during our sojourn in the Summit City, to the Champion Tailoring Co., No. 101 Calhoun street. This concern since commencing business in Fort Wayne, which, although of recent date, has not only become conspicuous for the excellence and elegance of the garments turned out, but also for their extremely moderate prices, which has resulted in bringing to their store a large and rapidly increasing patronage. In their salesroom they have now displayed for fall and winter wear a most elegant assortment of the newest designs, shades and patterns which are representative of the best products of the looms of America and Europe. These include fine woolens and suitings, trouserings, cloths, cassimeres, vestings, overcoating, etc., which will bear the most critical examination and inspection, and from which the most fastidious may select. The individual members of the firm are J. F. Schweitzer and S. Hirsh, both of whom have had a large experience in the trade, and in addition to the Fort Wayne store conduct fifteen more located in various cities of this county; while the present or main house is located in Louisville, Ky. Mr. Hirsh is an accomplished cutter and an all around workman and gives his personal attention to this department of the business. They are abreast of the times in their stock of novelties in fabrics and turning out garments in the latest fashion. In their work-room they are now giving employment to a force of no less than fifteen skilled hands, and considering that their business is not as yet fairly established, we can only conceive of the number of people they will require when it becomes generally known that at their place is where popular prices are always quoted. Every garment that has been turned out from their store is endorsed by the fastidious critics as superior in every respect, and their great experience and skill places them in the front ranks among the leaders of this difficult branch of industry. All orders receive that prompt fulfillment their importance demands. Persons residing in neighboring cities who do not wish to visit Fort Wayne can be called upon by their salesman with samples, providing they drop a postal requesting them to do so. Messrs. Schweitzer & Hirsh are courteous gentlemen, and came to Fort Wayne highly endorsed as straightforward and honorable, and if we are able to judge are such as will leave nothing undone to please those favoring them with their patronage. In concluding we think we are justified in the repetition of the statement that the Champion Tailoring Co. quotes "popular prices." Think of it, pants to order $5 and upwards; suits $20 and upwards.

GOOD BUSINESS

IS THE REPORT OF

CLARK FAIRBANK,

The General Agent of the Old and Reliable Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia.

When passing up Court street a few days ago your correspondent, whose thoughts had drifted miles from the "Summit City," heard the everyday cry of hello there! and turning around to ascertain from whence it came, was greeted by his old friend Clark Fairbank, who for the past sixteen years has been the general agent of the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia. As he is well known throughout this entire section his many friends no doubt will be pleased to learn that he is as genial as ever, and reports business as good as any previous year at this season. Yet which of our readers, who are familiar with their principles of insurance, could expect to hear else but a favorable report from any live representative of this old and time tried company, which has assisted so much in finally establishing in the minds of the public the advantage of the life insurance system. The necessity of making provision for one's family, in event of death, through the medium of life insurance, has become so obvious to all prudent men that the only question to be determined is, which company shall be selected? Not alone for our friend Fairbank's benefit, but because statistics show that the Penn Mutual is one of the staunchest, most reliable, and honorable companies of the world, we would suggest it. This company, since it was organized in 1847, has with every succeeding year shown greater strength, and there is nothing which is safe and desirable in life insurance, no new and commendable feature omitted from its plans. Its policies are incontestible after two years. They are non-forfeitable after three payments. A special feature of the company is that it issues women at the same rate of premiun as men, a feature which but few companies have adopted. The gross assets of the company at their last annual statement, January 1st, 1893, were $20,808,602.29. These assets are the very best securities in the market and place the company as one of the strongest in the world. Thoroughly informed as to insurance matters, Mr. Fairbank presents this company to the public, feeling secure in the fact that no corporation now engaged in issuing policies in America does so with a greater regard to the holder, or is more ready or able to pay all just claims. Call on or correspond with him for full particulars. His office is located at No. 19 Court street Fort Wayne.

HUSTLERS !

A Name Appropriately Applied to the Firm of

S. B. THING & CO.

It is only when carefully strolling over the city of Fort Wayne and viewing each individual establishment engaged in promoting its commercial interests that one is struck with the magnitude, importance and success of many enterprises which make but little show to the superficial observer. Among these is A. B. Thing & Co., 36 Calhoun street, who demonstrate the truths of this statement. We, as most of our readers have of course heard of this firm as "the hustlers" in the boot and shoe trade, but little did we think upon entering their establishment and inquiring for H. B. Tobey the manager, that he was a representative of the largest retailers of shoes in America. It however, required but a few moments' conversation with this very agreeable young gentleman until we were convinced that such was a fact. This firm, in addition to being one of the largest and strongest engaged in the wholesale boot and shoe business in Boston, conduct twelve retail stores, located in various cities of this country. In 1881 they laid the foundation of their Fort Wayne enterprise, which has been attended by the most marked and encouraging success. The premises they occupy are not only conveniently located with reference to trade purposes, but are large, commodious, attractively arranged and afford accommodations for a stock which in quality and variety, could not readily be duplicated. The amplitude of the stock which is there represented, embracing boots and shoes for men, boys, and youths, women, misses', and children, in all the various styles, sizes and varieties known to the trade, ranks the house as one of the best to patronize. Many of the styles offered are peculiar to this house, and being manufactured expressly for it, are not to be found elsewhere. The extent of their operations enables them to contract with manufacturers upon the most favorable terms, and thus to afford to their patrons such advantages and benefits both in quality of goods and economy of prices as many dealers are unable to give. They also carry a fine assortment of rubber boots, overshoes, artics, and sandals suitable for all ages and both sexes. These goods as well as all others are the productions of the most reliable manufacturers. "The best goods and one price only" is the invaluable rule of this firm who warrant their goods perfect in material and workmanship.

BREWING INDUSTRY.

The Immense Proportions It Has Reached in the Summit City, and How It Is Conducted by the

C. L. CENTLIVRE BREWING CO.

Whose Product Is in Extensive Demand in a Number of States.

Despite what may be said to the contrary, there is nothing more beneficial to the human system than pure and unadulterated beer. It tones up the system, stirs the blood into healthy motion, quickens the perceptive faculties and sweeps the cobwebs off the brain, as the saying goes. Mankind requires a tonic of this nature and must have it, as eight out of ten intelligent persons will admit. The brightest men of our country are indulgers to a greater or less extent in beer and similar beverages. And the people of the United States are coming to look at beer as a national beverage, and all fanatical opposition to its use is rapidly dying out. But not alone the individual, but the condition of our country is benefitted by this trade, and to-day it is one of the strongest pillars of our commercial prosperity. However, it is not our intention to write an essay on this subject, as we only started out to say a word concerning the product of the C. L. Centlivre Brewing Company, a concern that can supply as pure and wholesome beer as is manufactured anywhere, and which is to be found everywhere in Indiana, Ohio, and Southern Michigan, Eastern Illinois, and even in Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Louisiana, and other States far beyond the trade radius of Fort Wayne, which fact alone speaks for its superior quality, and its popularity with the trade and consumers. Your correspondent a few days since visited this establishment, which for years was known to him, but he had no idea as to its magnitude. The brewry is one of the best appointed he has ever seen and the machinery and appliances used in the brewing process are of the most improved character, and by far too great for him to describe in an article of this kind. It is located in the north end of the city on Spy Run avenue, and comprises a commodious five-story brick building which is architecturally an ornament to the city, and with its several annexes for malt houses, bottling works, ice houses, offices, etc., covers one full block. The quality of the product is remarkable for its flavor and excellence; it is pure, wholesome, and palatable, pleasing to the eye, nutritious, and exhilerating. The best known and most popular brands are "Kaiser," "Bohemian," and "Export." They are highly recommended for medicinal purposes, and wherever known have become general favorites for family use. Their superiority has created for them a large trade in the city of Fort Wayne, and the fronts of all its most prominent sample rooms are adorned with the handsome signs of this company which is the drawing card for trade. These beers are so prepared as to retain their flavor and quality for any length of time, only the choicest materials being used in their preparation. Pure water is one of the first things to be considered, and it is obtained from artesian wells ninety-four feet in depth; pure malt is another; this is of their own manufacture, and in 1892 they purchased all of the barley produced in Allen and adjoining counties and in addition purchased a large quantity from the West, consuming altogether over fifty thousand bushels. Hops are equally important and are purchased in large quantities from the States of Washington and New York which are acknowledged the world over as producing the best quality, while they also use a large quantity of the imported Bohemian. With a large storage capacity their beers are allowed to mature naturally, no artificial ripening process being employed; hence their unrivalled excellence. Their bottling works are also perfectly equipped with the most modern approved appliances, and here is where their celebrated "Export" designed for medical purposes and family use is bottled. Basing its claims to success on the quality of its beers the C. L. Centlivre Brewing Company has surely well earned its favor with the public at large. Over 30,000 barrels were sold last year in Fort Wayne, and through their agencies, the principal of which are located in the following named cities: Pittsburgh, Pa., New Orleans, La., Marion, Decatur, Bluffton, Warsaw, and Plymouth, Ind., Van Wert and Montpelier, Ohio. This brewery dates its foundation from 1862 by C. L. Centlivre and successfully conducted by him until 1889 when it was visited by the ravages of fire and completely destroyed. Preparations were immediately begun to rebuild and soon the present magnificent structure was completed. In 1891 Mr. Centlivre retired and was succeeded by his two sons, Louis A. and Charles F. and John B. Reuss, gentlemen of enterprise and large experience, who in every respect are qualified to conduct their large and increasing business, and who hold the good will of their fellow-citizens in general. The Centlivre Brewery is worth visiting, and we say to our readers, when you go to Fort Wayne you will at all times find a car on their own line and operated exclusively by them, at Calhoun and Superior streets, which will take you to the door. In the event of the absence of all the proprietors, you will meet genial and polite assistants, who will be pleased to show you through the immense establishment. Then, too, the Centlivre Park is very inviting and well worth a visit, containing as it does sixty acres, well shaded and picturesque in the extreme, and improved with every facility, including a splendid one-half mile track, upon which almost every pleasant day can be seen exhibitions of speed from some of the noted string of twenty-five speeders owned by the Centlivre Bros., among which the most prominent are Atlantic King, (2:10¼) in two successive heats. Mary C., (2:12), Nedia, and Kaiser Wilkes, each of which have low records. In conclusion your correspondent has only to say, and will use a familiar turf expression, their beers as well as their horses "are winners every time." All first-class dealers handle them.

WHERE TO STOP

WHILE IN FORT WAYNE.

THE HOTEL RANDALL

A Credit to the City and a Model in Every Sense of the Word.

Our visit to Fort Wayne has been a most pleasant one, as we have before stated several times. We have said much of its genial and accommodating merchants, but yet not a word relating to its hotels, which is a matter of no small importance to the stranger visiting the city. Fort Wayne has in the past five years not only attained a State reputation for the general excellency of its hostelries, but their fame has gone throughout the length and breadth of the land. The result is that travelers in these parts make a bee line for this metropolis, which they use as the base of their operations for the surrounding towns; transacting business and always making it a point to return by nighfall to the hotel of their choice, and which we are pleased to state for a large majority is the "Randall." This your correspondent did not take from mere rumor, but instead enjoyed the generous hospitality of its proprietors for a period during his sojourn in the city and is more than pleased to add his testimony in favor of this popular house. Through the courtesy of Dick Townsend, the genial managing partner, he was shown through the establishment, which is veritably palatial in architectural grace and beauty, and in interior decoration and its adjuncts of comfort and luxurious accommodation. It was erected in 1890 by the Hon. P. A. Randall, one of Fort Wayne's most esteemed residents, and opened to the public in May of the same year. In April of 1891 he arranged a partnership with Dick Townsend, one of the best-known hotel men in the State and whose great experience and popularity entitle him to the highest consideration, and from which time the success of the "Randall" became a fixed fact. It occupies a position at once unique and captivating, as bringing into requisition every modern ideal of comfort and convenience, superinduced by the ever-pleasing accessories of artistic conceits happily borne out in its furnishings and general appointments. Electric lights, gas, steam heat, natural gas grates, and sanitary plumbing and ventilation, nothing in fact is omitted to insure the highest degree of excellence in its care of guests and the requisites for securing their health and satisfaction. The building rises to an altitude of five stories, and is situated on Harrison street directly in front of Columbia street, bringing it in range of this busy thoroughfare and imposing and elegant business locations. The finish of the interior presents a harmonious and elegant appearance, and every provision has been made that can conduce to its identity as a first-class hotel. The guests' chambers single and en-suite number one hundred, and all are fitted with the most elegant appointments in rich carpetings, oak furniture, some with stationary marble lavatories and some with bath-rooms attached. The halls are wide, light, and airy, and upon each floor are bath-rooms and closets. The office, reading and writing-room are tiled and furnished in the most superb and artistic manner, while the dining-room, which has a seating capacity of 150, is magnificently furnished, and where every delicacy the bountiful market affords is served in the highest culinary art, which department is under the superintendence of a celebrated and gifted chef. The billiard-room, bar, barber shop, and bath-rooms are all finished in a style to correspond with the balance of the house. The affable Tom Carey, well known to the traveling public, is the efficient day clerk who fills his position faithfully and well, while the bar and billiard-room is in charge of Frank F. France, who is assisted by Joe Reigel, both of whom have hosts of friends, and as decoctors of beverages they cannot be beat. Returning again to Mr. Townsend, or Dick, as his familiars call him, he numbers his friends as legion. They come from the north, south, east, and west, and the smile of recognition and pleased expression when they meet him speaks volumes for how he stands in their esteem. In conclusion we must say the Randall is a model resort for the wearied man of business, the tourist, the professional and commercial representatives, and we take pleasure in commending it to our readers as the best $2.00 a day house in the State.

J. G. THIEME & SON.

A gentle modesty sometimes induces people to hesitate to tell their age, but your correspondent has no scruples in announcing, and certainly it will not be out of place to thus announce to your readers the age of the clothing and merchant tailoring establishment of J. G. Thieme & Son, corner Clinton and Columbia streets. This popular place was established in 1846, and has had an uninterrupted and successful course of nearly forty years. This place of business, conspicuous for its elements of prosperity is an unquestioned credit to the Summit City, and worthy of its founders, and the present high standing of the firm in commercial circles; it is, indeed, a complement as well as a natural result of foresight and good management in business transactions. The following will enlighten your readers as to the dimensions and business capacity of their establishment. It has 40 feet with a double entrance fronting on Columbia street and extends back on Clinton street 110 feet, and covers three floors. Upon entering from the east entrance we came to the merchant tailoring department, were we were met by Mr. G. C. Thieme, the junior member of the firm who is in charge of this department, and whom we found a very affable young gentleman. In this department is displayed an immense assortment, a collection of fabrics in all the newest shades, patterns and designs of both American and foreign manufacture which are the leaders for this fall and winter wear. After glancing over this immense stock we were shown some of the garments just completed, and as your correspondent claims to be a judge of gent's wearing apparel, has no hesitation in asserting that for style, cut, quality of material and workmanship, they were fully equal to the work of the best New York and Chicago tailors. Mr. Thieme, in addition to having fifteen years practical experience as a cutter, is also a graduate of the celebrated John J. Mitchell's Cutting School of New York, and is recognized as a leader in the city. He employs two experienced assistants in the cutting department, one of which is also a graduate of Mitchell's school. These, with an ample corps of skilled hands, insure patrons perfect fits. The prices they quote too, are extremely low, and in every instance insure full value for the money. Connected with this department by means of arches is that devoted to ready-made clothing and furnishing goods. There the assortment displayed comprises every description of clothing, all of their own manufacture, in which nothing but the best materials are used and are unsurpassed for general excellence and reliability. The next floor above is utilized as the work shop of the merchant tailoring department and for manufacturing. In the latter thirty-five hands find constant employment. The other floor is occupied for the storage of surplus stock. In conclusion, we ask you to visit this place and inspect their goods and prices. There is where you will secure the equivalent for your money, gratify your wishes, and not bankrupt your pocketbooks.

CROCKERY PALACE

Is the Name that May Appropriately Be Applied to the Establishment of

M. F. KAAG.

To go to Chicago at the present time and fail to take in the great Exposition, would be just the same as going to Fort Wayne and not visiting the great crockery palace of M. F. Kaag, No. 5 East Columbia street. For the past thirteen years this gentleman has been catering to the tastes of the housewives of Northern Indiana, and with such effect that his store is constantly thronged with customers. And it is right that it should be so, for his store is the gem of the city. Its home is one of the finest, its location one of the best, and its superb stock unequalled anywhere. The premises occupied for salesroom and display purposes covers five floors each of 20x110 feet in dimensions, and furnished throughout with an equipment which must be termed elegant. The stock of goods there exhibited is choice and valuable, varied and complete, and embraces the most exquisite specimens of the ceramic art, which includes china from the famous Haviland furnaces of Limoges; Carlsbad, and Vienna ware; Royal Crown ware from Worcester, England, Sevres ware, etc., exquisitely made Bohemian, Hungarian, Belgian, and French cut glassware, plain and decorated, English cut glass and the very best grade of American productions in the latter line, crockery, ordinary and select, ornamental ceramics, and silver plated ware chandeliers, hanging, stand, table, and hand lamps, toilet sets, in fact an almost inexhaustible variety of the most elegant designs and novelties is displayed. A specialty is made of fine art and holiday goods, also wedding presents in the most elegant designs obtainable. Mr. Kaag is a gentleman who possesses a practical and valuable knowledge of his business and with twenty-eight years experience is peculiarly fitted for the large demand he is called upon to supply. His trade is wholesale and retail, and is distributed throughout Northern Indiana and adjoining States. In the store five obliging and competent assistants are employed, while on the road is one traveling man. This fall he is prepared to offer special inducements in goods and prices, and those of our readers who are interested should not fail to call on him when in the city.

A VERITABLE MUSEUM.

The Establishment that Handles Everything.

Articles that Will Make the Hearts of the Little Ones Dance for Joy.

Among the features of the Summit City is the immense wholesale and retail emporium of James M. Kane, No. 24 Calhoun street, which is marked by a record of thirty-five years of unbroken prosperity—and maintains an eminent position in the trade, being the largest concern devoted to its special branch of mercantile activity in the State. It covers four floors each of 25x90 feet in dimensions, is supplied with every modern facility for the prompt handling, storing or display of goods which would be impossible to particularize in our limited space, but suffice it to say that there everything is handled. A multifarious assortment of goods usually called "notions." The choicest productions of European and American manufactures in hosiery, underwear, for ladies and gents, buckskin, kid, and seal-skin gloves, leather goods in large assortment, sewing baskets, workstands, and ladies' toilet sets in immense variety. Pocket and table cutlery, which includes in its immense variety the celebrated Rogers solid and plated ware. Novelties in jewelry, small musical instruments and music boxes, albums, easels, etc. Trunks, valises, and sample cases of all descriptions. Baby cabs, express wagons, carts and sleighs for boys and girls, of the latest designs, cradles and children's chairs, bicycles, tricycles, velocipedes, rocking horses, boys' tool boxes, children's writing desks. Dolls in almost endless profusion of all sizes, all qualities, and at all prices, dolls' furniture and complete outfits. Goods from the land of the Mikado, some of his own importation which includes the rarest bronzes, boxes, vases, fans, silk, and satin embroideries, choice bric-a-brac and in fact Japanese goods of ever description. Toys that will catch the eye of the modern papa or mamma, also the uncle and antie who never fail to bring the "little darling" something new to make his little heart dance for joy. Automatic and spring-working devices that are designed to make the baby laugh. And we must say they fill the bill completely. A mountain of big and little mechanical toys, games, and novelties for old and young. Christmas tree ornaments until you are tired of looking. Parents and relatives of the little folks will find it to their advantage to visit this establishment and look it over. This is unquestionably the best selected stock your correspondent has ever seen; while Mr. Kane acknowledges it the best ever exhibited in his store. His fall trade is daily increasing and at present a large number of clerks are busy attending to customers. In a few weeks a host of extra clerks will be put on to accommodate the winter business which promises to be the largest he has ever enjoyed, notwithstanding the fact that on every side is heard the cry of dull times. The people from all over Northern Indiana are beginning to realize that at Kane's they can save money.

THE UNCERTAINTY OF LIFE

How to Provide for Your Family Should Death Call You.

A Few Points with Reference to the Non-forfeitable and Incontestable Policies of the Union Central Life Insurance Co.

C. E. EVERETT, GENERAL AGENT.

One needs no clearer proof of life's uncertainty than that shown with appalling distinctness in the telegraph columns of our home papers, teeming, as they do, with reports of death's activity in all guises. It invades the floor of Congress alike with the home of the humblest, and from both natural and accidental causes its daily harvest is a large one. The mortuary record of our immediate community is sufficient to convince the most skeptical mind that no man can foretell the length of his days, and that death is no respector of person or condition. Of course this is a plain fact which every one can comprehend, but what is the lesson that it teaches? This also is obvious: It is the necessity of life insurance. To the man who considers the possibility of being the next called, and who sees that in such a case his family would be unprovided for, how terrible this lesson must strike home. Quite different, however, to his provident brother, who can look upon the matter as duty well performed, and who can truthfully say: "If I should die to-day, my wife and children will not want. They will be amply provided for. I have a policy with the Union Central Life Insurance Company." Such a man is surely to be congratulated upon his common sense, and he is a type of hundreds throughout Northern Indiana equally as judicious, who are members of this noted institution. It will no doubt surprise many of our readers, as well as it did your correspondent, to learn that this company has in the city of Fort Wayne and Allen County alone over eight hundred policy-holders, and over $3,000,000 insurance in force in this general agency, which embraces Northeastern Indiana and Northwestern Ohio. The Union Central is one of the foremost organizations in the United States, and carries on a national business, having reliable representatives in all the larger cities of this country. The general agency for this district is represented by C. E. Everett, whose handsome offices are located on the second floor of the Old National Bank building, corner Calhoun and Berry streets. Mr. Everett is a gentleman of wide experience in his business and took charge of the Fort Wayne agency three years ago. Of his success, and the popularity of his company no better evidence could be desired than the figures given above. The Union Central plans of insurance are the most liberal, its advantages are many, its policies are non-forfeitable and incontestable after three years, and its perfect reliability beyond the question of a doubt. The two latest policies of the company are the Twenty Payment Life Guarantee and Twenty Payment Guarantee Income Installment Policy. In our opinion the latter is the best we have ever seen, or heard explained. It is paid up in twenty annual payments and should the insured be living at the end of the twentieth year, this company will return at the end of each year during remainder of life the amount of yearly premium paid during these payment years of policy; or at the option of the insured he can take the cash surrendered value of the policy in one sum; or again when death occurs will pay each year one-twentieth of the amount of policy for twenty years. Upon this policy after three annual payments he can borrow, or in the event of being unable to pay the premium longer than three years he will receive a paid up policy, or if he desires the company will carry the insurance in force under the non-forfeiting clause without the payment of a single dollar for a number of years. The management of the Union Central Life Insurance Company is a model of system and ability, combined with that painstaking thoroughness which establishes the high character of the most reliable institutions. Its record is a most enviable one, which shows that from its very inception it has held the public confidence in the fullest measure. Mr. Everett is an agreeable gentleman to meet, and a person who has won distinction in his profession, and earned a most enviable reputation for zeal, integrity, and a profound knowledge of every phase of life insurance. In connection with insurance he has recently added the handling of real estate and loans. All transactions in either of these departments will receive the promptest and most careful attention. Our readers will find it to their advantage to call on or address him with reference to insurance, real estate, or loans.

THE C. O. D.

Is a Modern Clothing House, Worthy of a Visit and Your Trade.

They Check Your Baggage and Parcels Free of Charge, and Guarantee the Best of Care of Them During Your Stay in the City.

No branch of trade in Fort Wayne has been conducted with greater vigor and discretion than that of clothing; and prominent among the houses that are this season keeping their reputations up to the high level reached in the past is the C. O. D., conducted by A. S. Lauferty, which is one of the old landmarks and dates its inception back forty years. This store is located at 73, 75, and 77 Calhoun street, and anybody who goes to the city and travels in the usual lines of traffic cannot miss seeing its immense plate glass windows so uniquely dressed. From the outside it presents a handsome appearance; and when you get inside you are not disappointed, but find a typical and very thorough example of an up-to-date clothing house, which in its dimensions covers 4,000 square feet, all on one floor. It is conveniently divided into departments. The one which was of great interest to your correspondent was that devoted to mens' suits and with which he was particularly pleased. He found an immense stock made of the best materials, and which had the correct cut for fall and winter wear. Long Prince Albert and cutaway coats, also the nobby sack suits for business. The next was overcoats, which were also made up in the latest styles and of many different grades of materials. Another department which will be interesting to the modern papa and mamma is that devoted to children's suits, in which everything is kept that will please. The display in furnishing goods is immense, while in hats and caps the stock could scarcely be equalled. A commendable feature and one of which no doubt many of our readers take advantage is the package checking department of this house, which is conducted free of charge, and which is at the disposal of all who reside outside of the city. They check and guarantee the safety of all parcels left in their charge. Our readers will find the C. O. D. reasonable in its prices and a good place to visit even if you do not wish to purchase.

SCORED A VICTORY.

That Is What Can Be Truthfully Said of the Five and Ten Cent Store of Siebert & Good,

Whose Establishment Is the Largest of Its Kind in the United States.

The fall trade at the mammoth 5 and 10c store of Seibert & Good, Nos. 89 and 91 Calhoun street is attracting hundreds of visitors every day. As a matter of fact, it is a World's Fair in miniature, and any one could spend hours looking at the many useful and curious articles that fill the 2,400 square feet of space they occupy. This firm since commencing business in the Summit City three years ago has scored a victory, and is doubtless one of the best patronized institutions of the city. This establishment is fitted up in modern style and equipped with a patent cash carrier railway system and is, indeed, handsome and attractive in appearance, and in which fifteen clerks are at present kept as busy as bees, and which number will be increased to thirty inside of one month, in order to meet the demands of the holiday trade which promises to be very large.

The variety and excellence of the stock exhibited embraces an array of articles which cannot all be enumerated and named, because it would about fill our paper; but suffice it to say that there is glassware, china and crockery, house and kitchen furnishing goods, picture frames, stationery, tinware, toys, games, dolls, toy books and novelties in almost endless variety and assortment. In fact, this store, which is the largest exclusive 5c and 10c establishment in the United States, is an illustration of the familiar saying, "If you don't see what you want ask for it," because there are many useful and interesting lines of goods in addition to those mentioned. The bric-a-brac and hundreds of useful and ornamental odds and ends that go to make a pretty, a happy and artistic home are all to be found there. Judicious buying has been the key to the great success that has attended this hous . in large quantities for their three stores, and in addition belong to a syndicate of thirty similar establishments located in the east, in consequence the goods are purchased in large quantities at low figures. Everything imaginable that could possibly be bought for 5c or 10c is there to be found. Call on them when in Fort Wayne.

HANDSOME

And Comfortable Homes in a Prosperous Community.

Something About One of the Most Popular Establishments That Supplies the Furnishings for Them.

PAPE FURNITURE CO.

Fort Wayne is conceded by all who visit it to be a beautiful city, containing numerous magnificent residences, the homes of prosperous and orderly people. The same must be said of all Northern Indiana towns and cities; for nowhere in this great country can be found a set of people who take more pride in their homes. Drive out into the lovely country from any of its many beautiful towns or cities and view its fertile fields, and note the fine buildings, the homes of prosperous farmers which are as pleasing architecturally as those of the city residents, and their interiors generally filled with handsome and appropriate furniture which at once attests the culture and humanity of the people. Each year the demand for the various interor furnishings and decorations which add so much to the home comforts increases, and in consequence establishments supplying this demand are of the utmost importance. It is well known to every one of our readers that the hard woods of Northern Indiana are noted far and wide for their superior quality and fineness of grain. Fort Wayne, owing to its proximity to these forests, and with every other facility should naturally be a great furniture center. It is; and is recognized as one in which the finest goods are produced. To no other concern than the Pape Furniture Co. does it owe more for this unequaled reputation. This enterprising concern began business fourteen years ago and its success from the start is unprecedented in the history of the furniture trade of the State. They manufacture all of the goods handled, from the finest parlor suites to the plain kitchen furniture, and in their well equipped factory and saw-mill give employment to a force of seventy-five skilled workmen. Their elegant and commodious salesrooms at Nos. 28 and 30 East Berry street is unquestionably one of the finest and most elaborate in the State, admirably arranged in all details for the advantageous display of the immense stock there carried. It has the dimensions of 40x150 feet, with beautiful plate glass windows and an artistically built gallery in the interior, which adds much to the appearance. The attention of the visitor is at once attracted to the fine parlor goods, in all of the latest styles of coverings and finished in a style not surpassed by any manufacturer or dealer in the country. In chamber, library, hall, and dining-room furniture everything desirable will be found, and of such quality as to meet the expectations of the most critical. In the manufacture of the medium goods in all styles and prices this house manifests the same care and judicious judgment. In this store may also be seen brackets, knick-knacks, etc., in the latest designs and bewildering varieties, as well as all the specialties incidental to the furniture trade, and such as one would expect to find in a first-class establishment of this character. All the stock is remarkable for excellent and artistic workmanship, exquisite finish, and liberal prices. Besides an extensive patronage from the City of Fort Wayne and surrounding country, the trade relations of the Pape Furniture Co. extend to every city and town within a radius of fifty miles of the city. Charles Pape, one of Fort Wayne's most public-spirited business men, is the proprietor. He is a gentleman possessed of the attributes which are requisite for a successful business man, and has sustained a business interest which has grown to be one of benefit to himself and the community. The management of the store is in the hands of E. C. Schell, a capable as well as courteous and attentive young gentleman, who is unceasing in his endeavors to please customers. The Pape Furniture Co. competes and is not afraid of rivalry. When in Fort Wayne call and see their store.

ONE-HALF CENTURY

Is a Long Time to Look in the Future; Looking Backward It Dates to the Foundation of the JACOBS SHOE STORE.

Fort Wayne can very justly boast of its fine retail shoe stores, and of the most progressive concerns engaged in this line of business it has been an acknowledged fact for many years that the Jacobs Shoe Store, 17 Calhoun street, is not only one of the largest, but leaders in the trade of the city. One half century ago the foundation of the business was laid at the same old stand. Each year a large increase of trade was noted, until to-day it might be said that the amount of business done is simply immense. It is without doubt one of the best located in the city, and occupying three floors as it does, all of which are packed to overflowing, enables them to carry one of the largest stocks of any retail establishment in the city. It has long been the headquarters for farmers' trade, and a very popular centre for fine city trade. They carry everything in the line from a twenty-five cent carpet slipper to the finest French kid shoes. For thirty years they have had the sole agency for the celebrated hand-made Hartford Kip and German Kip boots. Their facilities for buying direct from the manufacturers is superior, and possessing large capital which enables them to discount bills, save in the course of a year enough to make a fair profit. In consequence, the Jacobs Shoe Store for good goods and low prices will invariably be found right "in it." Your correspondent is pleased to say these pleasant things of this house and has no hesitancy in commending to our readers.

LIFE A FAILURE,

OR SUCCESS.

Some Advice Which, if Followed, May Make It a Success.

A Course in Practical Business Training, Short-Hand or Typewriting Will Pave the Way to Future Prosperity.

The world is full of people, some of them industrious, ambitious and well educated and many of them shiftless, reckless, and ignorant, and if we were to ask the questions, Is life a failure, or is life a success? the one would positively assert that it is; while the other class would unhesitatingly answer that it is decidly not a failure. In a measure both answers would be true, as the question is applied to the respective classes; for life is a failure to those who are themselves failures through lack of personal effort. The competition of modern times is so great that unless one goes forth to do battle with his mind thoroughly manned and equipped, he will be no match for those who are. The young person of these days who is turned into the world without any training such as will suffice to raise him above a pitiless and hopeless struggle for the daily necessities of life is indeed to be pitied. The prospects of life are apparently blighted and independence even in its paltriest sense is but the shadow of a name. Fortunately, however, there is a way out of the difficulty which lies within the reach of all. It is simply this, learn something useful, something bread winning. A knowledge of book-keeping is absolutely necessary to one who hopes to successfully compete for commercial honors. A knowledge of shorthand and typewriting is also a most useful attainment for any business man; while they are absolutely necessary to secure a remunerative clerkship in either commercial or professional lines. The International Business College of Fort Wayne has become one of the leading institutions of its kind in the United States and its methods of instruction such as experience has shown to be the most practical and generally desirable. A set of regular business offices are connected with this school, furnished with all necessary books, blanks, etc., where the principles of actual business are taught, embracing with them a thorough knowledge of commercial law. These offices comprise the several systems of express, railroad, freight, and transportation, merchandizing and commission business, expert accountant office and banking in all its branches. The course of instruction in short-hand and typewriting is thorough and exhaustive, and is, as well as the other departments, under the most competent teachers.

The International Business College is undoubtedly one of the best equipped educational institutions we have ever visited, and the success achieved by Prof. T. L. Staples, the Principal, in his thorough system of business training is sufficient evidence that his certificate held by the successful graduate will be a guarantee of proficiency which will have more influence with business men than the most flattering recommendations from private individuals. Graduates from this college occupy important positions not only in the offices and counting rooms of Fort Wayne commercial and professional houses, but throughout Indiana and other States. Students can enter at any time is one of the commendable features of the institution, while among the many others is that the rate of tuition is extremely moderate, and living expenses so low in Fort Wayne that any young man or woman can avail themselves of a practical business education. In conclusion we say to the young men and women of this community, with their future before them, this college offers every inducement to a fast coming independence, in a thoroughly imparted education. A catalogue will be mailed free upon application to all who are interested.

UMBRELLAS and PARASOLS

Are Indispensable Requisites; Also Very Appropriate for Holiday Presents.

H. M. LONG

Manufactures the Finest to Be Found.

There are many industries of real importance in this country, of which the public know but little. The finished products can always be seen, but few people give a thought as to where and by whom they are made. Yet it would be a very difficult matter to dispense with many of these articles as they serve most useful purposes. Among these may be classed umbrellas and parasols, articles which none can afford to be without. The former is an indispensable adjunct to any one who of necessity is obliged to be out in the rain or snow; while the latter leads a grateful shade in hot weather. During his sojourn in Fort Wayne your correspondent met H. M. Long, whose place of business is located at No. 15 Arcade Building, and whose excellent productions in this line have given him a wide popularity. He manufactures, repairs, and recovers parasols and umbrellas, and in the conduct of his enterprise the services of four workmen are constantly required, and all orders promptly executed. Repairing and recovering done while you wait. In his store he carries a large and attractive stock and makes one of the most complete and creditable displays we have ever seen. These goods are all of his own manufacture and which he guarantees. For the workmanship, superior quality of materials, variety and elegance of handles, and extremely moderate prices at which he offers them, we will, without hesitation, recommend him to our readers, and ask one and all of them when they visit the city to call and see his stock, which doubtless is one of the largest in the State. The holidays are now rapidly approaching and no doubt many are beginning to think of an appropriate present for their friends. What is more acceptable and useful than a good umbrella? These Mr. Long has in large variety, and in every respect suitable for the occasion.

VERY POPULAR

Is the Old and Well Established Wholesale and Retail Dry Goods House of

GEO. DeWALD & CO.

You may inquire of any resident in this community, or anywhere within a radius of thirty miles of the city of Fort Wayne as to the business in which the firm of George DeWald & Co. is engaged and few, indeed, is there among this vast number who will not answer without hesitation "dry goods." Of the many with whom your correspondent came in contact during his short sojourn in this busy city, every one felt a pride in the immense establishment of this firm whose name for years has been a synonym for superiority in everything pertaining to this branch of trade, and which is acknowledged as one of the leaders of the State. The high esteem in which this house is held is not confined to Fort Wayne alone, but is shared by the residents of all sections of Northern Indiana. Two generations of customers have patronized this, the oldest dry goods house in Fort Wayne. The descendants of early patrons continue to trade with the house which supplied the best goods to their parents. As years passed along, the city grew, and the country developed, this house kept pace with the march of progress. To-day their establishment at the corner Calhoun and Columbia streets shows one of the largest, finest, and choicest stocks in the State. A few days since we had the pleasure of a tour of inspection through the entire establishment in company with A. R. McCurdy, one of their genial representatives, who is well known to many of our readers on account of his having been connected with the house the past twenty-years. We found the first floor of their magnificent building occupied as the retail department. This floor has the dimensions of 40x110 feet, and divided into departments which are packed with the choicest seasonable offerings of home and foreign markets, and which are so fresh and attractive as to captivate the most exacting taste. The active business which is here conducted requires constant accessions of new goods almost daily in every department, and in consequence every novelty as soon as produced finds its way to this store. No matter how diversified are the requirements of the public, they can be amply met. The eye can flash on the rarest and costliest productions of the loom, the very latest styles in dress goods, newest designs in gloves and hosiery; the favorite brands of housekeeping supplies; the very best goods to be found in the dry goods trade. In addition to the foregoing we found the cloak department stocked with the richest and most superb lines of ladies', misses', and children's shawls and wraps, a full line of seal garments, and other choice furs, while another department was devoted to everything in the line of lace curtains. In this department employment is given to twenty-five competent and obliging salesmen and saleladies, who minister promptly and satisfactorily to the demands of their large patronage. Passing to the six floors above we find the wholesale department, in which are boxes, piles, and packages of all kinds of goods, and without attempting in the limited space possible in this article to describe this stock in detail, it is sufficient if we say that it is not excelled in assortment or surpassed in extent, and covers everything in the line of dry goods, and purchased with a view to meet the requirements of the trade of this house, which reaches points in all directions within one hundred miles of the city. In this department twenty people are employed, among which is included their five traveling men. With unsurpassed facilities for the procurement of stock and shipment of goods, large resources and systematic business methods, this firm has built up the large trade they are enjoying, and which puts their house in the front with the leaders in the line. We are pleased to give prominence to this firm, and say to our readers, ask the firm with which you trade for goods from George DeWald & Co., the firm which so long has occupied a leading position in the dry goods trade in this section.

NOT RELIEF, BUT CURE

A Painful Affliction Utterly Vanquished

By the Renowned Dr. DeSouchet Hernia Cure System.

As anything pertaining to matters of health is of general interest, your correspondent, of course, in making his rounds of Fort Wayne, would naturally come in contact with some of its professional men, and among this number we deem it proper that prominence should be given to J. M. McClellan, a gentleman who renders valuable services in the cure of the afflicted. Could the statistics of sufferings from hernia, or rupture, as it is usually designated, be collected the record would show an enormous aggregate of pain and misery now borne without necessity. We say without necessity—for this distressing affliction can be certainly and permanently cured if the right means are employed. Modern science and research have proved equal to the task of evolving a method of treatment that is unfailing in its results. Notwithstanding, it is still the case that hundreds of thousands of persons continue to suffer the discomforts and torments of this dreadful disease. Many no doubt suffer because they are not aware of a permanent cure, and think their only means of relief are the clumsy trusses they are compelled to wear, while others continue to suffer long after the fact of a remedy is known. Of course the people of Fort Wayne and our own community have not been favored until recently with the opportunities in this direction which some other large cities can boast. Fortune however has at last favored it and the De Souchet Hernia Cure Company has founded an institute under the management of this eminent gentleman, who has the State privilege and will put in operation their methods of treatment which has long since been conclusively demonstrated to be efficient in every case. Six thousand in the United States have been cured by this system, and some of which were the most difficult cases, but with such notable success as to constitute it a boon to any community. Dr. McClellan is a gentleman of wide experience in this special line and came to Fort Wayne highly commended by leading professional men of New York as straightforward and reliable in every respect, and with testimonials from those who have been permanently cured by him, which if we were to give would require columns of our space. He will undertake with confidence the treatment of any reduceable case of hernia and guarantee a cure in from one to two months. In fact he guarantees all cases and makes no charges until a cure is effected. By this celebrated method, no operation is required. No pain is experienced. No truss is worn after the cure and no patient is detained from business while undergoing treatment. Dr. McClellan desires the physicians in every city and town in the State to investigate the merits of this treatment and to whom he wishes to sell the right for their vicinity. We think enough has been said to interest all persons suffering from this dreadful disease to give attentive consideration to the advantages presented by this gentleman, and we in conclusion heartily advise them to call or address him at No. 16 Arcade building for further information and testimonials from patients who have been cured.

THE INVENTIVE GENIUS,

And What He Has Accomplished.

A Few Facts About the Celebrated Weisell Washer, a Machine Which Should Be in Every Home.

It has been greatly due to inventive genius that the United States to-day enjoys the prominence it does among the nations of the world. Yet this is not all that the untiring and thoughtful inventor has accomplished. He has added usefulness and cheapness to the cost of living; has placed convenience and comfort at our doors and made many a home and family happy. No locality, but what has seen and enjoyed the effects of that all silent patent force of the inventive genius in its midst. This force is unobserved for a time, the public are heedless of what is being done until the germ is quickened into life, and soon what seemed to have no merit, became a monster force and a convenience which can be utilized in every home. This is but a faint picture of most every useful article and invention now in use. Those which are made with a view to convenience, comfort and usefulness are the articles which are in greatest demand. None know so well as the housewives the arduous duties of wash day, and none have been more appreciative of the efforts of inventors to devise a labor-saving machine that would successfully perform the work. Our readers are aware that for years washers of various styles and designs have found their way on the market. It is true some were really good, but many were absolutely without merit, and have long since passed out of memory. However, the demand for a perfect washer existed all over the universe. The people, in fact, had grown hopelessly weary of experimenting, but at last there appeared a candidate for public consideration. It was the Weisell washer and the people at once noted that it had the true scientific principles, and possessed of features which enabled housewives and daughters to save many backaches and not look toward wash-day with a horror. Its fame was quick to expand. Every one who tested it was prompt to recommend it to their friends and finally dealers bought it as a staple article. Thus in three years the Weisell became the most popular washer on the market and its manufacture an industry of great importance. This machine is constructed on the correct principle. It duplicates every action of the hands upon the old-style washboard, namely: rubbing, pressing, rinsing, etc. It requires less labor, will clean more clothes, and is guaranteed not to tear the finest fabric. Diether & Barrows, the manufacturers give a guarantee with every machine, and if directions are followed and it does not prove to be all they claim it can be returned and the money will be refunded. What more could be asked? In addition to the Weisell they manufacture several other cheaper styles, viz: The Corrugated Round and the Western Standard Washer, machines which are sold everywhere and for the price are unequalled. They also manufacture the Handy Folding Bench which is made of hard wood, nicely stained, is neat and attractive, occupies small space when folded and is strong and durable. It is designed for a wash bench, displaying goods in stores and is also used as a flower stand. Deither & Barrows are among Fort Wayne's most responsible business men, and their factory is the largest and best equipped in the United States devoted to the production of wash machines. Write to them for testimonials, catalogue and prices.

SUCCESSFUL INSTITUTION

Handling the Many Specialties in Which Our Lady Readers Are Interested.

THE PEOPLE'S STORE

Some men are born to be leaders and that too, no matter into what avenue of activity their energies may be devoted, whether marshalling forces on the battle field, directing the affairs of state, or managing a commercial enterprise. The elements of successful leadership are pre-eminently foresight and tact. The truth of the above was clearly demonstrated to us a few days ago during our sojourn in Fort Wayne; in the success which has attended the efforts of Beadell & Co., of the People's Store, No. 20 and 23 East Berry street. This house, although only dating its inception from the spring of 1889, at once became a popular purchasing resort and each succeeding year has witnessed a gratifying increase in the trade. We can distinctly remember our first visit to this establishment, when twelve salespeople were ample to promptly meet the demands of all patrons; what a change since then; instead of twelve we find forty, who are constantly kept busy, and the immense store packed with purchasers. This firm possesses a keen sagacity and judgment in selecting the latest styles and quality of goods to meet the fastidious tastes of the best class of trade; while remarkably low prices at once attract the attention and are appreciated by the people from all over Northern Indiana. The store, which has the dimensions of 50x150 feet, is one of the most elegant in its appointments, and best lighted dry goods emporium in the city. The front contains two large plate glass windows which give it a genuine metropolitan appearance, and are arranged in accordance with the large, varied and elegant stock displayed within. The business is divided into various departments, and each department is complete in itself and presided over by attentive and courteous persons. There are separate and distinct departments for dress goods, silks and velvets, linens, woolens, cloaks, fancy goods, ladies' furnishings, notions, etc. In dress goods, which is the most attractive, and the one in which our many lady readers are most interested, a showing is made that would indeed be difficult to equal. Here is represented all of the latest novelties, all of the newest and most popular goods for fall and winter wear, which are from the best productions of English, French, German and American looms. The next, which is of most interest to the ladies, is that devoted to cloaks and wraps, a department which we will confess we cannot do justice in an article of this kind, and give an idea of the many styles there exhibited, it must be seen to be appreciated; but will, however, say that these garments are made up in the very best manner and of the best materials and are in perfect accord with the prevailing eastern fashions. The stock of linens, woolens, fancy goods, notions, ladies' furnishings, etc., together with all the sundries and specialties incidental to the dry goods trade, can be found in large assortment and of such qualities as to meet and supply any demand. Beadell & Co. are members of the Dry Goods Union, and have at all times a purchasing agent in New York where their supplies are bought in vast quantities for spot cash, direct from the manufacturers and importers, at the most advantageous rates, which thus enables them to offer inducements to the trade far beyond the reach of many contemporary houses. Their business is conducted strictly upon the cash system and one price prevails. They make a specialty of mail orders, and satisfactorily and promptly meet all demands in that direction. Their store is a very attractive one and worthy of a visit. The electric cash carrier system is in use and all patrons are served politely and with dispatch.

PROSPEROUS INSTITUTION

Possessing Large Capital, and Standing in the Front with the Leading Financial Institutions of this Country.

WHITE NATIONAL BANK.

Figuring conspicuously as among the great national banks of the country by reason of its large capital and constantly expanding resources the White National Bank commands the most distinguished and successful identity. Its career began April 25, 1892. Since then it has shown a progressive and salutary direction, and its administration has determined for it a place among the National banks of the country, which invests it with an honorable and laudable distinction. The bank commands a capital of $200,000.00, a surplus of $18,000.00 and undivided profits of $7,380.17 and has every facility for transacting the banking business in its most modern and appreciable conditions. Its correspondents are prominent banking institutions of every section of this country which gives them unsurpassed opportunities for making collections. Exchange is bought and sold and drafts drawn on the principal cities of this and foreign countries. To this institution too much credit cannot be given, as to them belongs the distinction of being the originators of paying 3 per cent. interest per annum on certificates of deposit running four months or longer. That this feature is appreciated is evidenced by the following which was overheard by your correspondent while in the city. During the month of September the deposits in this bank were increased, while from all over the country came the discouraging cry of a decrease. The home of the White National, which is practically fire proof at the corner Clinton and Wayne streets (of which we give an illustration) is one of the most elegant appointed edifices for the banking business in the State, and was erected at great expense to supply all the requisites for future expansion so significantly predetermined by it official board. Its interior furnishings, which are of oak, would be difficult to equal, while for practicability, ventilation, illumination, and general conveniences it has no superior anywhere. The vaults are burglar and fireproof and were built expressly for this institution and have walls of several feet thickness, while there are double steel doors; the outside one being provided with the latest improved triple movement time locks. Especial pains were taken to have these vaults secure against the ravages of fire, or the more terrifying attack of burglarious dynamite. The one is used for the books, papers, currency, etc., of the institution and the other is the safe depository in which there are 600 safes varying in size to suit every requirement, and which rent for $5 and upwards per annum. The President of the bank is Mr. John W. White, one of Fort Wayne's most respected residents, who is ably assisted in the management of its affairs by Mr. Thos. B. Hedekin as Vice President. Mr. Harry A. Keplinger is the efficient and popular Cashier, while the office of Assistant Cashier is acceptably filled by Mr. G. G. Detzer. In conclusion we commend the advantages of this institution to those of our readers who may require a financial or collecting agent in Fort Wayne.

A MUSICAL EDUCATION

Where It Can Be Obtained, and Some of the Advantages Afforded by It.

BANISTER SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

Of all human accomplishments none hold a higher place in popular esteem than that of music, and in none is the effect of training more observable. The advantages of Fort Wayne for securing a first-class education in both vocal and instrumental music were certainly rendered complete five years ago, when the Banister School of Music was established, and which has since devoted itself to a thorough course of instruction on the piano and the study of music by the best modern composers and ancient writers. As a teacher of both vocal and instrumental music, Mrs. L. Webb Banister has shown a rare capability and the fame of her school has spread over a wide range of country. This school is meeting with great success and is steadily improving, many have received the benefits of its training and can testify to its excellence. Pupils may enter at any time during the year and can pursue either course of study, or both if desired and on completion of either course will receive the diploma of the school. Musicales are frequently given at the school and the commencement exercises once each year at the Masonic Temple and always to an overflowing and most appreciative audience. This is a feature which cannot be too highly commended, as it teaches the pupil how to perform before an audience, and serves as an incentive to faithful practice in the finer finishing of pieces and also gives parents and friends an opportunity to judge of the pupil's progress. The next term of ten weeks will commence November 13th and to those of our readers who are interested we say, write for information, terms etc., as no similar institution is more capable or more worthy of patronage.

PHOTOGRAPHY.

A LEADING PROFESSION.

The Work Exhibited by One of Fort Wayne's Leading Photographers.

In no branch of the arts has more advancement been made during recent years than in that of photography, and the activity with which the inventions and improvements have been utilized by the profession is a convincing proof of the spirit and enterprise of the artists of our day. One of the oldest and unquestionably one of the best-known studios of Northern Indiana is that at the corner of Berry and Calhoun streets which for years was conducted by F. R. Barrows, but who on September 11th was succeeded by G. J. Parrot, a young gentleman of years of practical experience, and whose work cannot be too highly commended for its neatness, elegance, fine finish, and general superiority. He has resided in Fort Wayne for years and is popular with a wide circle of acquaintances. During our visit to his well equipped studio we were shown many magnificent specimens which show the master hand of the skilled artist and may well be pronounced as works of art. Photography in all of its branches is executed at his gallery, and such work as he turns out cannot be otherwise than satisfactory. Our readers when in the city should call and inspect it and we feel sure that they will agree with us and say that he is a thorough artist and one who gives the closest attention to every detail of the business.

WORTH VISITING.

The Fort Wayne Exclusive Cloak House.

It Would Delight any of Our Lady Readers.

In making the rounds of Fort Wayne's many vast emporiums it would have been utterly impossible for your correspondent to have overlooked its exclusive cloak house, located at 52½ Calhoun street; for everywhere he heard of it, and when on the thronged street he noticed the multitude of ladies, all of whom seemed to be directed towards it. This of course aroused his curiosity to such an extent that no mortal ever possessed sufficient persuasive power to have kept him from visiting it. He called and inquired for the proprietor, Mr. V. Gutermuth, who in a very few moments was at his service. After the usual introduction, our mission was briefly stated and at once we proceeded to look over one of the busiest establishments it has ever been our pleasure to visit. Everywhere throughout the large and elegantly equipped salesroom of 16x150 feet were a coterie of admiring ladies, from whom such expressions were heard as "Oh, how lovely!" "What a perfect fit!" and numerous other exclamation of approval and pleasure. His attention, however, was soon taken from the ladies when the proprietor began to exhibit for his inspection cloaks and wraps for ladies and misses of the choicest cloths, plushes, velvets, and furs of all kinds, which were beautifully lined and richly trimmed, and which are perfect examples of the latest Parisian, London, and New York fashions. Goods which we can truthfully say are unrivalled for quality, elegance, and excellence, and are quoted at prices that must command the attention of the closest and most prudent buyers. After looking over the almost unlimited stock of cloaks, wraps, and furs which were displayed in an immense variety, we were shown ladies' suits which were made up in the latest and most correct styles, shawls, ladies' and misses' mackintoshes, and goods of a kindred character in large variety. Throughout this establishment a most thorough system is observed, the business being conducted smoothly and harmoniously and the public want ministered to with eminent satisfaction by eight accomplished assistants who by courtesy and attention win the respect of all who visit the store. The Fort Wayne Exclusive Cloak House is a place of the greatest convenience, especially for those residing outside of the city whose time there is probably limited; it is centrally located and the large and varied stock there carried furnishes all the latest and most novel requisites in its special line, so that it obviates the necessity of going from place to place to find what is wanted. Mr. Gutermuth is a young gentleman of large practical experience in this department of trade, who for eighteen years prior to engaging in business on his own account was at the head of the cloak and fur department of one of Fort Wayne's leading dry goods houses; thus giving him advantages for the prosecution of his enterprise possessed by but few. He has met with a large measure of success and during the fifteen months since commencing has advanced to the front position among the dealers in the line and where we predict he will remain. To his store, all are welcome, whether they wish to purchase, or merely inspect.

HARD TIMES, NO!

Business as Good, if Not Better than Any Previous Year at the

WAGNER DRUG STORE.

H. G. Sommers, the proprietor of the old and reliable Wagner Drug Store, No. 35 Calhoun street, said a few days ago to your correspondent, "Business is as good with me, if not better, than previous years, consequently I cannot find fault with the times. The trade disturbances seem to be generally over, and confidence almost fully restored. The weather, however, has had much to do with my trade, and medicines people will have and must have whether the country is in a prosperous condition or not." All of our readers are familiar with the class of goods handled in an establishment such as he conducts, and as his business is both wholesale and retail, there is nothing to be found in any first-class drug store which he cannot supply. In addition to carrying a full stock of everything in the drug line he prepares several remedies of unexceptional merit the efficacy of which has been conclusively established. Wagner's Pectoral Balsam, for the various diseases of the throat and lungs, is one of the best medicines ever prepared for the purpose, and has been before the public many years and still retains its hold upon popular favor and is wonderfully effective in the cure of bronchitis, asthma, croup, whooping cough, diphtheria, cold affecting the lungs, and incipient consumption. Superior Aromatic Stomach Bitters is a certain preventive of fever and ague, and is a more effective tonic than quinine, while it removes sallowness from the skin, leaves the whole body strengthened, the intellect clear, and the eye bright. It is also a sure cure for dyspepsia, flatulency and all diseases that are brought on by overloading the stomach with heavy, rich and pastry foods. These medicines are compounded with the utmost care from the best materials and the testimonials received attesting their virtue is beyond number. They cannot be equalled and should be in every household. Ask your druggist for them, if he does not keep them order them direct.

TEAS AND COFFEES

Of Absolute Purity Can Be Obtained by Dealing Direct with

THE UNION PACIFIC TEA CO.

We doubt if there is a reader of our paper who is not aware that of all articles of food none are so difficult to obtain in their original state of purity and wholesomeness as teas, coffees and spices. And it is only by the enterprise and honorable methods of such concerns as the Union Pacific Tea Company, importers, who conduct a branch at No. 102 Calhoun street, that absolute purity in these staples have been made possible and advantages secured to the public of the most important character. This concern handles teas, coffees, spices, and baking powders of the different grades, and only such goods as can be fully guaranteed. A specialty is made of high grade teas and coffees and the prices at which these goods may be purchashed are the very lowest consistent with fair and equitable dealing. The store is systematically arranged, is attractive and unique in appearance and is artistically painted. Like all establishments dealing exclusively in these goods they offer inducements in the shape of presents to the trade, but none have we ever seen that will equal the china and glassware which they present to customers who purchase one pound of tea or one dollar's-worth of coffee. The interests of the company are looked after by F. C. Phillips a courteous young gentleman who has had an extensive experience in this line, and who has made many friends in Fort Wayne since taking the management of this branch, and stands high with the numerous patronage of the house.

DR. B. GARD,

Fort Wayne's Noted Specialist.

A Most Prominent Representative of the Medical Fraternity.

If experience in any of the learned professions is a necessary qualification to a successful practitioner, then Dr. B. Gard, Fort Wayne's resident specialist is entitled to a most prominent position in the ranks of the medical profession. A graduate of the E. M. Institute, Cincinnati, and has been in actual practice since 1862, in which time he has attained a well merited success. In 1870 he cast his eyes toward the Summit City and there became domiciled in April of the same year and where he has, since devoted himself to the treatment of special diseases of men and women, and to orificial surgery (either sex), and by but very few men in this country is the Doctor matched in experience. He has attained a celebrity for the successful treatment, of asthma, lung and other pronounced incurable diseases by the most succesful method. In orificial surgery his success has been remarkable and is worthy of special note, and the attention of all who may be afflicted and who may not only in every instance be afforded relief, but completely restored to health. In the treatment of cancer he is also very successful and a number of remarkable cures have been effected. For rheumatism, paralysis, locomator, ataxia, nervous debility, etc. the Electro-Therapeutic bath is the most beneficial, and nowhere can be found one who is better prepared for the treatment of these diseases than Dr. Gard. He is thoroughly scientific in the application of electricity, which imparts to the patient a delightful refreshed feeling of unwonted vigor. His patients come from remote parts of the country and your correspondent feels safe in saying that no member of the medical fraternity stands higher in the estimation of the community than he, and none are enjoying such an extensive practice. Those of our readers who are afflicted should consult with or write to him for particulars, feeling assured that the same will prove to their advantage.

COMFORT AND PLEASURE

Is What the Traveler of the Present Day Demands.

To Be Sure of Them when in Fort Wayne Stop at

THE WAYNE HOTEL.

The travellers of the present day are not satisfied with the accommodations of a generation ago, but demand all the comforts and conveniences that modern ingenuity and skill have devised. The only hotels that now attain prominence are those in which these devices and appliances are provided. The proprietor must be of broader guage than his predecessor who would be sadly out of place the present day. Impress a stranger favorably on the hotel subject and you have won many words of praise for your city, for the city is judged by the hotels it supports. A model hotel is the grandest work of man. These facts are generally acknowledged and their truthfulness thoroughly recognized by Fort Wayne, the nerviest and sprightliest city of the "Hoosier State." The Wayne, its chief hostelry, was erected in 1887, and opened to the public in April, 1888, by the genial Wm. M. McKinnie, who has since successfully conducted it. Its location is most eligible on West Columbia street near Calhoun, and is readily accessible to the electric car lines which affords communication with all parts of the city. The building is four stories high, is elegantly and tastefully furnished throughout, and is equipped with every modern convenience, which includes electric lights, gas, steam heat, etc. A fine elevator serves to convey guests to the upper floors, while ample protection is afforded against fire. The parlors are beautiful and artistic in their decorations. The one hundred guest chambers, single and en suite, are light, airy, well ventilated and luxuriantly furnished and with such beds in fact as will woo the restless guest to sleep. The office, reading and writing rooms are especially attractive and inviting, while the dining-room we must say is simply elegant, and will comfortable seat 150 guests. The table is supplied with the best the market affords, including all seasonable delicacies. The service is prompt and noiseless and beyond criticism, in fact all the employes of the house are well trained and courteous and are quick to anticipate the wishes of guests. Mr. McKinnie, the proprietor, has long since achieved the reputation of being one of the best hotel men in the country, and has hosts of friends among the traveling public. Mr. L. Bonneville is the efficient day clerk, and and Geo. Jack always on hand at night, while J. W. Fahnestock is the cashier and book-keeper. These gentlemen are well versed in all that pertains to the hotel business, and are valuable assitants to the proprietor. Whenever any of our readers have occasion to visit Fort Wayne, they will insure their comfort and pleasure by inscribing their names on the register of the Wayne.

BARGAINS

WAYNE HARNESS & BUGGY CO.

Experience has proven to your correspondent that many of the people of this country are not aware of what constitutes a bargain. Some have an idea that it consists simply and wholly of low prices. Never was a greater mistake made. A genuine bargain must consist of an article that is desirable, low in price, and of good quality. Under the guidance of an employe we made a tour of the immense establishment of the Wayne Harness and Buggy Company, 49, 51, and 53 East Columbia street, and after a critical inspection of the stock of harnesses of all grades, carriages, buggies, surreys, etc., he was convinced that he had struck a place at which real bargains were now being offered. Of course many of our readers know that this company are extensive manufacturers of harness and do a wholesale business which extends over a number of States. While they have given special attention to the development of this department of their business they have not discontinued the retail business in Fort Wayne, and this feature of their trade is by no means insignificant. They have the advantage of smaller concerns from the fact that their supplies are purchased in large quantities and employing a large force of hands are in consequence able to offer superior goods for less money. Such prices as they are now offering hand-made team harness of oak-tanned leather and every strap solid would surprise any reader. In fact the prices at which they are offering all grades of harness beats anything we have ever heard. Buggy harness from $6 upwards, think of it! Then too in vehicles they undoubtedly outstrip every other dealer. They handle the product of the Buckeye Buggy Company which are acknowledged superior. The immense stock they have on hand, which comprises carriages, buggies, surreys, phaetons, and spring wagons of all stlyes are being closed out at first cost. In addition to the above they carry a large and complete stock of saddlery, turf goods and everything usually found in an establishment of this character. To those of our readers who contemplate the purchase of harness or a vehicle of any kind, we say do not wait until spring when prices will have advanced; but go to Fort Wayne and inspect the stock of this establishment which is now offering such rare bargains.

Cures Dyspepsia.

Rebecca Wilkinson, of Brownsvalley, Ind., says: "I have been in a distressed condition for three years from nervousness, weakness of the stomach, dyspepsia and indigestion until my health was gone, I had been doctoring constantly with no relief. I bought one bottle of South American Nervine, which did me more good good any $50 worth of doctoring I ever did in my life. I would advise every weakly person to use this valuable and lovely remedy: a few botties of it has cured me completely. I consider it the grandest medicine in the world." Warranted the most wonderful stomach and nerve cure ever known. Trial bottle 15 cents. Sold by Robbins & McCord.

WATERLOO.

Mrs. Phil Plum has purchased the Huber grocery and will continue the business in the same place.

Charlie Speer has been home a couple of weeks. He may stay some time, as business on the lakes has about closed for the season.

Mrs. Capt. Stevens fell one day last week and hurt herself quite severely; although no bones were broken, she received a severe shaking up.

House cleaning in several of the churches has been going on for some days. The U. B. and M. E. churches look much better for the work.

The ladies of the M. E. church of this place will prepare a grand thanksgiving dinner and hope to be well patronized. Make up a big mouth for a feast.

Cary Beidler came home from Chicago nearly two weeks since, sick with asthma, from which he suffered some days. He has now gone to Goshen in search of a position.

Eli Williamson has returned home after an absence of some days, Miss Ada Williamson visited with her sister, Mrs. McCord, at Auburn, during this time, but is now at home.

Mrs. Nill and Mrs. Heller, of Ft. Wayne, who have been visiting Mrs Geo. Morel, of Auburn, since Saturday, came to Waterloo Monday to visit Mr. and Mrs. Phil. Morel, returning home Tuesday.

Last week members of the M. E. church here to the number of eleven went over to Auburn to attend the revival services in the M. E. church there. Many others of that church and others would enjoy being present and say in their hearts, "God speed the good work."

Sunday morning Dr. Fry preached an excellent sermon and a practical one from Matthew, 6th chapter and part of the 24th verse: "Thou shalt not serve God and mammon." It was a plain command, and was expounded in a plain manner. There was much said that should have caused a deep searching of heart, and much to take home for thought through the week.

The L. M. C. held their regular session Tuesday evening at the home of Mrs. Carrie Francis. The following program was presented: Responses, World's Fair notes; Literature of the Revolutionary period, Leader, Mrs. Darby; recitation, Mrs. Mary Boozer; reading, "The Battle of Trenton," Mrs Long; Table Talk, Superstitions, conducted by Mrs. Winslow.

F. N Beidler went to Auburn Monday morning of this week to fill a position in the mercantile establishment of Schaab Brothers. Mr. Beidler has had an experience of many years in the business and the firm are fortunate in their selection. His family remain in Waterloo, where he will spend Sunday and fill his usual place in the M. E. church in the Sunday school and at the other services, where he is an active worker.

The chicken pie social held at the home of Mrs. Josephine Willis last Friday evening was well attended. The supper was abundant, as to variety and quantity, and was served as only good housekeepers understand how. Your correspondent cannot give the numbers present, as tableful after tableful was served and many were leaving during the whole evening, while the parlors were filled with those who had not yet been served or were staying to enjoy the society assembled.

Tuesday, the 7th, the regular session of the L. M. C. was held at the home of Mrs. Olive C. Jackman. Election of officers took place, resulting as follows: Mrs. Carrie C. Francis, pres; Mrs. Florence E. Waterman, vice-pres; Mrs. Mattie E Beidler, sec'y.; Mrs. Olive E. Long, treas.; Mrs. Juliette Dickinson, critic; Mrs. Sarah C. S. Winslow, custodian of table talk. The attendance was good and the program, as carried out, interesting.

BUTLER.

Our stores were crowded with customers last Saturday.

Mich Thiel and his bride have set up for themselves in the Fetter's dwelling on West North street.

Our people living so near the late battle field in Ohio were nearly as enthusiastic over the result in that state as if it had been on the native soil of Indiana.

November seems to have donned her brightest smiles for the past ten days. Smooth hard roads and bright warm sunny days have been the average November in this climate.

The M. E. church ladies have gone to an expense of more than $100 to have the church lighted by electricity, and they give very poor satisfaction, affording but a trifle more than half the light furnished by the old chandelier and at an expense of about six times the old cost.

The Butler Manufacturing Co. elected a new board of directors last week, choosing the old board again. We learn that Mr. Mitchell recently from Auburn becomes the new secretary. With all the depression in manufacturing interests they have been enabled to keep their wheels in motion, and are turning out a large amount of work.

A native Syrian from mount Lebanon, entertained a large audience at the Lutheran church last Sabbath, with a lecture on Mohammedism and religion as taught by the bible. His inability to speak our language interfered materialy with his effort, still the lecture was very instructing and entertaining. He goes back to his native mountains to spread the truths of Christianity.

HISTORY OF A WEEK

PEOPLE, PLACES AND THINGS OF THE WORLD.

A Teacher and One of Her Pupils Burned to Death—Attempted Train Wrecking—Terrible Experience of a Shipwrecked Crew—Destructive Earthquake in Mexico.

BURNED TO DEATH.

Sad Fate of a Teacher and Pupil—Fire and Panic in a School House.

Nunda (N. Y.) special: The schoolhouse at Cooperville took fire, and the teacher, with one of her scholars, was burned to death. The schoolhouse is situated two miles north of this village, and Miss Porter, a young lady, was the teacher. The only door to the schoolhouse opens into a large woodshed on the south side, which was filled with wood. By some means unknown to anyone this took fire before the morning recess and was a mass of flames when Miss Porter opened the door. The flames came into the schoolroom as from a furnace, under the high wind, and it is supposed Miss Porter was suffocated almost at once by her clothing taking fire, as she stepped back a few feet and fell where her body was found. Her head was nearly all burned away, and also one leg. John Willard, aged 4 years, son of Conrad Johnson, was also burned to death. He ran to the teacher for protection when he met his sad fate.

There were about twenty scholars in the school when the fire burst in at the door, and as Miss May Porter opened the door all was at once confusion. There were two negroes in that schoolroom, Melvin and Charles Chambers, aged 16 and 14 years. Their action undoubtedly saved many other lives. The only door to the school house was a sea of flames and no one could escape that way. The boys dashed out the windows and literally threw the children out to save their lives.

Melvin was severely burned about his face, but remained in the school house until every child was rescued.

Billy Beane Dead.

Billy Beane dropped dead at the foot of the stairs leading to his office in Goshen, Ind. Heart disease is the supposed cause of his death. He has spent his whole life since arriving at the age of manhood in the printing business and has had charge of the Goshen Democrat since 1860. He was one of those genial, whole-souled men who it is always a joy to meet. His long connection with journalism and his original way of writing and conducting his paper gave him a wide and extended acquaintance. He was very popular with the craft, and his sudden death will be severely regretted by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance.

Eight Days Without Food or Water.

The steamer Madiana, which arrived at New York from Barbadoes, reports ship Columbia (Nor.), Captain Hansen, from Swansea, September 10, for New Orleans, in ballast, had experienced a hurricane October 3, was dismasted, and sprung a leak. Her crew of seventeen men abandoned her October 4, and took to their boats, losing one man. They were eight days without food or water, and lost everything they possessed. They landed at St. Martin's and took passage on the Madiana for Guadaloupe, where they took passage for Europe by steamer.

Disastrous Upheaval in Mexico.

City of Mexico special: News has been received here that the recent earthquake did great damage to the town of Coyuca De Catalan, State of Guerrero. The Catholic Church, public school buildings and many houses were totally destroyed. The houses that were left standing were badly wrecked and twisted, and many of them were uninhabitable. The loss on property is estimated at $200,000.

Train Wreckers.

Near Worthington, Minn., a gang of robbers attempted to wreck the Omaha passenger train for the purpose of robbery. The track was blocked so as to throw the train from the track, and while awaiting its arrival the gang held up, shot and robbed a passer by, which fact put the railroad officials on their guard and an engine sent before the regular train found the track spiked.

The Cuban Revolution.

The steamer Yumuri has arrived at New York from Havana, bringing news of the spontaneous uprising of small bands of revolutionists all over the Island. Gen. Marti said: "The present movements were started by the best youth of Las Lajas, a prosperous town of Clentugos, the rich port of the south coast. All neighboring towns immediately joined."

Dispersed the Meeting.

A meeting of Anarchists at Berlin, to commemorate the hanging of the Chicago Anarchists was broken up by the police.

Outlaws Attack a Town.

About 10 o'clock the other night, eight desperadoes rode into the little town of North Middletown, ten miles east of Paris, Ky., and it is supposed they intended robbing the Deposit Bank. They fired at every one seen on the street, and mortally wounded an old colored man named Burt Morris. The citizens began firing, and ran them out of town.

An hour later they returned, and the citizens being on the watch, fired on the desperadoes and ran them away. About a half mile from the village they stopped in front of a cabin in the road, and were heard to say three of them were shot. They were followed next morning some distance, by blood in the road, but finally were lost trace of. They went in the direction of Mt. Sterling. All were strangers, and not masked. More than a hundred shots were fired, and it is miraculous that the citizens escaped unhurt, with the exception of the old darky.

FIRE AT MEMPHIS.

A $500,000 Blaze in the Heart of that City.

Memphis (Tenn.) special: Fire started Tuesday night about 7:15 o'clock in the Wetter block on Main street, between Monroe and Union streets, and before the flames were checked, several lives were lost and nearly half a million dollars' worth of property went up in smoke. The exact number of lives lost is not known, but a conservative estimate places it at four, while four or five were injured, some fatally, in jumping from the burning building.

About 7:15 o'clock people in the vicinity were startled by the report of an explosion and a flash. In an instant the flames were pouring from the lower floor of the six story building occupied by the Schmaltzreid Hardware Company. The second, third, fourth, and fifth stories were occupied by the Young Men's Christian Association, and it was in this place that the terrible loss of life occurred. The fire started from the explosion of a large coal oil lamp near the stairway, and within five seconds after the explosion occurred the front end of the building was a seething mass of roaring, crackling flames.

The second floor was used as a lecture room of the Y. M. C. A., while the third story was used as a library, and it was in this death trap that the holocaust occurred. The flames leaped up the staircase so fast that all egress was cut off. There were about fifteen people in the library when the alarm was given. They made a rush for the Main street exit, only to be driven back by the flames. Like a herd of sheep in a pen they rushed in a bunch for the windows at the rear of the building, but the flames spread so rapidly that the facings of three of the windows were on fire before they could escape. They stood huddled together for a moment when the crowd below yelled: "Leap for your lives!" One man jumped and caught on a telegraph wire, but was rescued. Another made a leap for the same wire, but missed it and fell to the pavement below. Two other men made the same attempt, but they, too, missed the wire, and went down on their comrades. At this juncture the firemen arrived with ladders which were quickly run up to the window. Three men were rescued, but before the others could be saved the flames burned the ladder and the remainder perished. The loss will fully reach $500,000.

PRIESTS BANISHED.

Twenty-five Catholic Clergymen Exiled in Russia.

Berlin special: Advices have been received here from St. Petersburgh that twenty-five Catholic priests were recently exiled from the Vistula district, in which they have been charged with the care of souls, on the charge that they had opposed the authorities. They were to be sent to Grondo and Kieff. The other day, under guard, the priests started for their destinations. A large number of peasants gathered, and, seeing that the priests were being forced to leave, made an attempt to rescue them from the gendarmes which had them in charge. A desperate fight followed. The peasants would most likely have succeeded in their object had not the gendarmes been reinforced by a number of Cossacks. Even then the peasants continued to fight for the release of the priests. Finally the Cossacks fired into the crowd, killing and wounding many persons. The affair has caused great excitement among the peasants, who at no time are lovers of the Cossacks. Further trouble is feared. The priests knowing full well that there could be only one outcome to such a dispute, tried their best to calm the excited feelings of the peasants and thus avoid bloodshed. The peasants, however, would not listen, but insisted upon freeing them in spite of their expressed wishes to the contrary. After the volley was fired into the crowd the peasants dispersed and the gendarmes started away with their prisoners.

EIGHTY SOLDIERS

Are Hunting Six Men, Who Are lost in the Mountains.

Missoula (Mont.) special: William E. Carlin, son of Gen. W. P. Carlin, of the United States Army; his brother-in-law, John Harvy Pierce, and A. Himmelwright of New York, are snowed in at the head of Clearwater River, in the Bitter Root Mountains, and grave fears are entertained for their safety. Capt. Louis Merriman arrived in Missoula recently to organize a searching party.

Mr. Carlin and party left Spokane about September 20 for the head of Clearwater, in Idaho, on a hunting trip, expecting to return about November 1. The hunters had several pack horses, and were accompanied by Martin Spencer as guide; also, two other men as packer and cook, making six men in all. Nothing has been heard from them, and in compliance with a message from General Carlin to Captain Merriam a searching party has been organized here. The snow is now from four to six feet deep in the mountains, and it has snowed for over a month in the range.

A Bold Attempt at a Hold Up in Illinois

Mount Pulaski (Ills.) special: The Peoria, Decatur and Evansville express from Peoria to Mattoon, which was boarded at the coal shaft at Lincoln Tuesday night at 8:45 o'clock by three masked men, two on the front of the rear coach and one on the rear end, reached here a little late. Conductor Chris Richmond says he started through the combination car to take tickets, and as he opened the door of the car was confronted by one of the robbers, who ordered him to throw up his hands. He closed the door and informed the brakeman they were attempting to rob the train. The brakeman, W. F. Trott, took a club and opened the car door, when he was shot in the abdomen by some of the robbers. The conductor says he then cut the bell rope and he and the express messenger extinguished the light in the express car and barred the door. The train ran through to Mount Pulaski, where the robbers got off as the train stopped. The express messenger, peering from the dark car through the door took two shots at them, but without effect.

Big Four Wreck.

The Big Four Railway had a head-on collision near Indian Hill, seven miles from Lafayette, Ind. Twenty-six freight cars were wrecked and both engines demolished. Several of the cars took fire and were burned. Engineer Harry McHale, Fireman Don Wilson, and Brakemen Forrester were slightly injured, Wilson having a broken ankle. The money damage of the wreck will be large.

The Corbett-Mitchell Fight.

Jacksonville (Fla.) special: Another question has now floored the Corbett-Mitchell contest business, and that is the sudden change of base of the city fathers, or rather of the Mayor, who says now that the contest cannot take place in the city limits. The City Attorney gives it as his opinion that the Mayor has the power to prevent the fight from taking place within the city limits. All sporting men seen, say that while this means that the match must be outside of the city, yet that fact has no discouragement for them, as such a site can be easily selected accessible and capable of accommodating all that may come. The news from Tallahassee is that there being no State law to forbid such a thing as a boxing match, that no effort will be made to give trouble. This comes from headquarters.

Explosion of Gas Motors.

A gas motor in the North Side Street Railway barn, at Chicago, exploded, and the explosion of ten other motors immediately followed. There was a disastrous fire, resulting in the total destruction of the eleven motors and the buildings, with forty street cars. The total loss will probably reach $100,000, which is covered by insurance. The cause of the explosion is unknown. A motorman had just applied a match to the burner and left the car when the crash of the explosion was heard, followed immediately by ten more. The flames jumped to the ceiling and in an instant the barn was in a mass of flames. Few employes were in the building at the time, and all escaped without serious injury.

Barge Run Down.

Bilboa special: A steamer belonging to the same line as the dynamite laden craft which caused the disaster at Santander, collided with and sank a barge crowded with workmen the other night. It is claimed that the steamer did not carry any lights and that she did not stop after the collision. Most of the workmen thrown into the water from the barge were rescued in an almost lifeless condition by the people who witnessed the disaster from the shore. Several of the unfortunate passengers of the barge were drowned in spite of the efforts made to rescue them.

Refused One-Half Million.

Chicago special: The makers of No-To-Bac, the guaranteed tobacco habit cure, lately refused a syndicate offer of one-half million for their business. No-To-Bac is an absolute guaranteed cure for chewing, snuff-dipping and cigarette smoking. It is sold by nearly all the druggists in this country and Canada. Made by the Sterling Remedy Company, Box 21, Indiana Mineral Springs, Ind. Chicago office, 45 Randolph street. They print a book called "Don't Tobacco Spit and Smoke Your Life Away." Every tobacco user should read it. Mailed for the asking.

Prairie Fires.

A special from Laporte, Ind., says: The big marshes, bordering the Kankakee River, are on fire and an immense sea of flame is carrying destruction in its path. The fire threatens to sweep over the tracks of the Lake Erie and Western Railroad, and burn over a large contiguous territory. Several hundred men are battling the flames.

Generous Giver.

The will of A. Montgomery, who died at San Francisco on the 4th inst., has been filed for probate. After leaving $650,000 to his widow, $100,000 in trust for his two children, and $50,000 for a monument, the remainder of his estate is left to the San Francisco Theological Seminary. His fortune is estimated at $3,000,000.

Crank Arrested.

What is believed to be the man who so murderously assaulted Myron T. Herrick, Secretary and Treasurer of the Society for Savings, at Cleveland, has been captured. The suspect gave his name as W. H. Gannon. A revolver found in Cannon's possession contained but two cartridges. He refuses to talk.

Fire at Fort Wayne.

Fire at Fort Wayne, Ind., destroyed the Aldine Hotel, Geary's Theater, and the Aldine Printing Company, the Gazette Office, A. Hattersley & Sons, plumbers, J. M. Miller's furniture factory, and other buildings in the neighborhood were badly damaged. Loss $100,000.

Killed His Friend.

While handling a revolver at Monroeville, Allen County, Ind., Sam Insberger, aged 12 years, accidentally shot his friend, John Colver, aged 12, in the abdomen. Insberger's revolver fell on the ground and went off, and the fatal shot was purely an accident.

Another Dividend Declared.

John P. Hopkins, receiver of the Chemical National Bank of Chicago, has written to Comptroller Eckles that a second dividend of 20 per cent. had been declared in favor of the stockholders, payable Dec. 1.

BACK TO HER THRONE

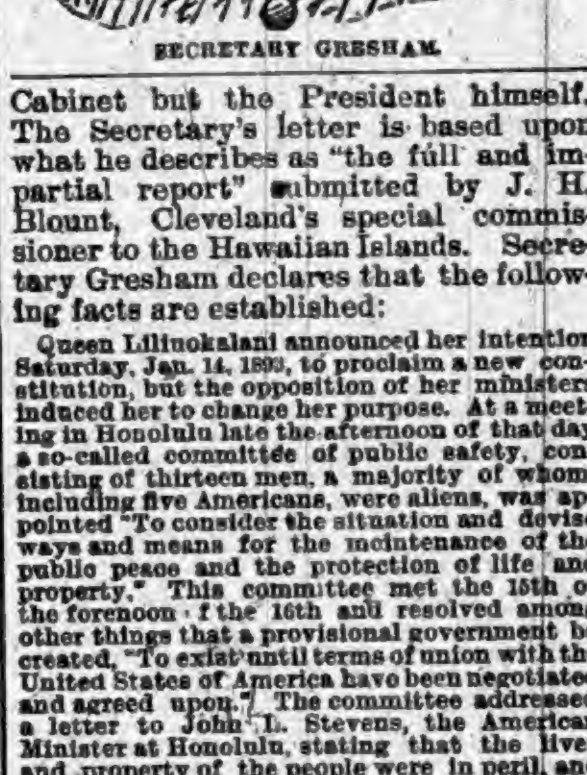
QUEEN LILIUOKALANI TO BE RESTORED.

An Examination of the Case Has Convinced Secretary Gresham that a Wrong Was Committed the Queen of the Sandwich Islands.

Says 'Twas a Conspiracy.

Queen Liliuokalani will be restored to her throne in Hawaii, if she has not been restored ere this. Friday afternoon President Cleveland's Cabinet held an unusually long session, and as a result of the discussion it was decided to give to the press the recommendation made by Secretary Gresham in the Hawaiian matter to the President. Minister Willis arrived in Honolulu on Monday last, it is supposed, and as he had in his pocket instructions in conformity with the recommendations of Secretary Gresham, which have been approved by the President, it is probable, says a Washington correspondent, that by this time the provisional government has been deposed and the Queen has reasserted authority over the islands.

At first other members of the Cabinet opposed this method of settlement. They declared the restoration of the Queen would be unpopular, and that it would be an unfortunate thing for the administration if it adopted this policy. But gradually the Secretary's presentations of the question won over not only the other members of the Cabinet but the President himself. The Secretary's letter is based upon what he describes as "the full and impartial report" submitted by J. H. Blount, Cleveland's special commissioner to the Hawaiian Islands. Secretary Gresham declares that the following facts are established:



SECRETARY GRESHAM.

Queen Liliuokalani announced her intention Saturday, Jan. 14, 1893, to proclaim a new constitution, but the opposition of her ministers induced her to change her purpose. At a meeting in Honolulu late the afternoon of that day a so-called committee of public safety, consisting of thirteen men, a majority of whom, including five Americans, were aliens, was appointed "To consider the situation and devise ways and means for the maintenance of the public peace and the protection of life and property." This committee met the 15th or the forenoon of the 16th and resolved among other things that a provisional government be created, "To exist until terms of union with the United States of America have been negotiated and agreed upon." The committee addressed a letter to John L. Stevens, the American Minister at Honolulu, stating that the lives and property of the people were in peril, and appealing to him and the United States forces at his command for assistance. On receipt of this letter Mr. Stevens requested Capt. Wiltz, commander of the United States steamship Boston, to land a force. The well-armed troops were promptly landed and marched through the quiet streets of Honolulu with two Gatling guns to a public hall, just across the street from the Government building and in plain view of the Queen's palace.

The Protest Was Prompt and Vigorous.

The governor protested against the act as an unwarranted invasion of Hawaiian soil and reminding him that the proper authorities had never denied permission to the naval forces of the United States to land for drill or any other proper purpose. About the same time the queen's minister of foreign affairs sent a note to Mr. Stevens asking why the troops had been landed, and informing him that the proper authorities were able and willing to afford full protection to the American Legation and all American interests in Honolulu. Only evasive replies were sent to these communications. Then the committee entered the government building after first ascertaining that it was unguarded, and one of their number, a citizen of the United States, read a proclamation declaring that the existing government was overthrown and a provisional government established in its place "to exist until terms of union with the United States of America have been negotiated and agreed upon."

No audience was present when the proclamation was read, but during the reading forty or fifty men, some of them indifferently armed, entered the room. The executive and advisory councils, mentioned in the proclamation, at once addressed a communication to Mr. Stevens, informing him that the monarchy had been abrogated and a provisional government established.

On receipt of this letter Mr. Stevens immediately recognized the new government, and in a note addressed to Sanford B. Dole, its president, informing him that he had done so. The Queen was informed that the provisional government had the support of the American minister, and, if necessary, would be maintained by the military force of the United States.

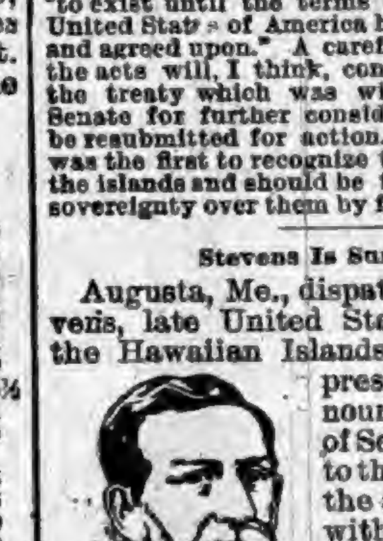
Secretary Gresham concludes:

The earnest appeal to the American minister for military protection by the officers of the provisional government after it had been advanced shows the utter absurdity of the claim that it was established by a successful revolution of the people.

The government of Hawaii surrendered its authority under a threat of war until such time only as the Government of the United States, upon the fact being presented to it, should reinstate the constitutional sovereign and the provisional government was created "to exist until the terms of union with the United States of America has been negotiated and agreed upon." A careful consideration of the acts will, I think, convince anyone that the treaty which was withdrawn from the Senate for further consideration should not be resubmitted for action. Our Government was the first to recognize the independence of the islands and should be the last to assume sovereignty over them by force and fraud.

Stevens Is Surprised.

Augusta, Me., dispatch: John L. Stevens, late United States Minister to the Hawaiian Islands, was shown the press dispatch announcing the report of Secretary Gresham to the President upon the affairs connected with the Hawaiian revolution. Mr. Stevens read it carefully and said: "The position to which Secretary Gresham has seen fit to commit himself is so extraordinary, so void of a real foundation of truth, so calumnious of the living and the dead, that I have no extended reply to make at this time. I prefer to let time and events and history decide as to the issue the Secretary has raised against the Provisional Government and the aspersions he sees fit to cast on the deceased Captain of the Boston, the officers under his command, and myself. The way the United States Minister and the officers of the Boston discharged their responsibilities at Honolulu in January was more than covered by Secretary Bayard's instructions, approved by President Cleveland, of July 12, 1887."



JOHN L. STEVENS.

Sure to Result in Bloodshed.

Indianapolis dispatch: When the news of the action of the Cleveland Cabinet in reference to Hawaii was carried to General Harrison to-night he was inclined to doubt it, and said he did not think the President would announce a policy, except in a message to Congress. "But in any event, whether or not," he said, "I do not want to comment on Mr. Cleveland's acts." General Harrison continued: "The Queen cannot resume her throne, I believe, without bloodshed, and it remains now to see whether the United States service will be used to establish her in power again. The question of annexation is one of deep interest to America, and will be handled, I have no doubt, by the newspapers and the people in a patriotic manner."

HARD TO EXPLAIN.

Results of the Election a Surprise to Washington Politicians.

Washington dispatch: The result of the election was received with surprise by all political parties here. The unexpected happened in so many instances that in no case were the predictions of Democrats, Republicans, or Populists fully verified. The chief surprise of the Democrates arises, not from the fact that they were defeated, but that the defeat was so general in all doubtful States and the Republican majorities so overwhelming. Expressions from nearly all the prominent Democratic leaders at the capital several days before election showed that the Democrats were preparing for defeat in those States where the free coinage element is strong and the disappointment over the passage of the repeal bill intense, but it was hardly expected that in the "sound money" States of New York and Massachusetts the Democratic majorities of the past would be so ruthlessly mowed down and the careful efforts of perfect organization avail so little. Despite this all the prominent Democratic leaders unite in ascribing the general defeat throughout the country to two causes. The dissatisfaction of the agricultural elements over the financial question and the widespread apathy of disappointed office-seekers who have failed to realize the fruits of the last Democratic victory. In Iowa the defeat of Boies is important, not in that it means a Republican Governor in that State and a Republican United States Senator next winter, but that it practically removes Boies from the list of Western candidates for the Presidency in '96.

The President did not show that intense interest in the returns that would have indicated a confidence in Democratic victory. Early in the evening the President went to his country home instead of remaining at the Executive Mansion, as is usual on election nights, and the returns he received were only those of sufficient importance to be telephoned out to Woodley by Private Secretary Thurber as the latter received them from the telegraph wire at the White House.

Gov. Boies Is Resigned.

A dispatch from Waterloo, Ia., Governor Boies' home, says: Governor Boies takes his defeat philosophically. On account of his illness he was notapprised of the result until next morning. The Governor manifested no surprise, and said that personally he had no feeling of regret, though for his party he had hoped for a different result.

CARTER HARRISON'S ASSASSIN.

His Trial Will Come Off During the Last Week of November.

Eugene Joseph Prendergast, the assassin of Mayor Harrison, of Chicago, has been very quiet, except for the first few days, since his arrest, and has refused to answer any questions. Instead of being the criminal hero he expected to become he finds he is despised by all. The prisoners, his fellows, have been outspoken in their denunciations of him, and he knows their sentiments well. This general feeling of abhorrence had its effect on Prendergast, and after a few days' incarceration he lost much of the fierce look and speech of madness which he betrayed on his arrest. When the physicians appeared to make an examination of him the other day he was perfectly quiet, and refused to speak further than to answer necessary questions. He was subjected to a most elaborate physical examination. His head and body were measured, his eyesight tested, and his heart and lungs sounded. The physicians at the end refused to give the results until they had consulted together. And, in any case, they said, the trial was the only proper time for them to speak.

Prendergast was brought before Judge Dunne for examination. His lawyers asked for thirty days' postponement in which they might call witnesses from a distance. The case was set for Nov. 27. This proved satisfactory, and Prendergast was taken back to his cell. The defense will be insanity, and the prosecution will endeavor to prove that Prendergast is not insane.

BOMBS IN A THEATER.

DASTARDLY ANARCHIST OUTRAGE AT BARCELONA.

Infernal Machines Thrown from the Gallery Into the Midst of the Large and Fashionable Audience—Fifteen Persons Killed—Wild Struggle to Escape.

Deed of a Dastard.

A dynamite bomb thrown by alleged anarchists into the midst of a crowded theater is the latest outrage and disaster to be recorded in Spain. The Liceo Theater, on the Rambla de Capuchines, the Italian opera house, in Barcelona, was filled the other night with an audience estimated to have numbered about 4,000 people. The opera "William Tell" was being performed for the first time after a long interval.

While the performance was proceeding two dynamite bombs were suddenly hurled from the topmost gallery into the midst of the stalls on the floor of the house. One of the bombs exploded with a terrible report, which shook the theater to its foundations and scattering death and destruction upon all sides. The second bomb, happily, did not explode, having fallen in the lap of a lady.

For a moment the Liceo was filled with smoke and dust, falling glass, and plaster, which caused a horrible rattling din, which increased the feeling of terror and wild panic which animated the vast audience. The terrified crowd fearing that at any moment another bomb might be thrown into their midst, completely lost all sense of control; all regard for women and children seemed to vanish, and there was a mad rush for the doors. Men and women fought with each other as they crushed weaker ones beneath their feet in the effort to escape from the dynamite shaken theater, leaving the wounded and dying behind them, tended only by a few of the braver heads, who remained faithful to their dear ones. In this mad rush many old people and children were severely injured through being trampled under foot, while others were severely bruised and crushed by the crowd. The stalls presented a terrible sight; the part where the bomb exploded was a mass of splintered wreckage.

Fifteen Dead Bodies Found.

When the wreckage was in some degree cleared away there were found fifteen dead bodies, of which six were those of men and nine the corpses of women. The bodies of the unfortunate ladies lay close together, their bright-colored evening dresses, laces and jewelry, gloves, hats and other finery drenched with blood and torn in the most fearful manner. It is reported, soon after the examination of the dead, that a large proportion of the killed belonged to one family who had taken a number of tickets, it is presumed forming a theater-party in honor of the birthday of one of those lying there shattered to death by the anarchist's bomb. The stairs and corridors were next searched for dead and wounded people who fell victims to that terrible rush for the doors which followed the explosion. Upon the stairs and in the corridors three persons were found dead and a large number of seriously injured people were picked up. Throughout the night the theater was surrounded by a crowd of people who were with difficulty kept back by a strong body of police.

Immediately after the explosion all the houses inhabited by suspected anarchists were searched and several arrests made. Gen. Campos, soon as he was informed of the outrage, immediately wired to Madrid, and government messages monopolized the wires for the remainder of the night. Among the dead is an American named Figueras.

BODIES WERE MUTILATED.

Belief that the Crews of the Wrecked Steamers Were Run Down by Some Boat.

Owing to mutilation of many of the bodies from the Philadelphia-Albany collision on Lake Huron it is now believed that the yawl containing twenty-four members of the combined crews was run into by some passing steamer. No sea was running from the time the lifeboats left the sinking Philadelphia until it was picked up by the life-saving crew from Point aux Barques station, and yet the skulls of some of the victims are crushed and all are more or less bruised.

The Albany was bound from Chicago to Buffalo, and the Philadelphia from Erie to Duluth. Both were running under check on account of the dense fog hanging on the water. Fog signals were being exchanged regularly with their whistles as the steamers felt their way through the fogbanks. When the boats came together the sharp iron prow of the Philadelphia struck the Albany forward of the second gangway, or about one-third the way back from the bow. The Philadelphia cut in nearly five feet and then hung there. The lake was nearly quiet, only a slight swell from the recent gale running. Capt. Angus McDonald at once realized that his ship had received a mortal blow and requested Capt. A. E. Huff to have the Philadelphia take the Albany in tow, with the hope of beaching the steamer or at least reaching shallow water, where the wreck might be raised. This was done and the Philadelphia started for the shore, which was some ten miles distant. Water poured so fast through the break in the Albany's steel plates that after some ten minutes Capt. McDonald ordered his men to abandon the ship, and they were all safely taken on board the Philadelphia. Up to that time Capt. McDonald supposed that the Philadelphia was not seriously damaged, as she had struck his steamer head on. The Philadelphia continued to drag the sinking Albany shoreward, but half an hour after the collision the Albany reeled and then went to the bottom bow first. By this time the Philadelphia was seen to be in the greatest peril, and the two lifeboats were launched. The crews were evenly divided between them, the two captains going in one with most of the officers, while to the other were allotted most of the common seamen. The two boats pulled away from the sinking steamer a few minutes before she followed the Albany.

Seventy years ago he removed to the farm in Harrison County on which he now resides, and has lived there continuously since that time. The Story of a Woman's Atonement, by Charlotte M. Braeme.

CHAPTER XII.

May, with its blossoms and flowers, had come at last. Lady Charnleigh and Lady Fanshawe had taken possession of the magnificent mansion in Belgravia, which the late Lord Charnleigh had beautified and decorated in the most superior fashion. He had lavished a small fortune on it, and, in its way, it was as luxurious as a palace.

The first few days of their stay were occupied in procuring dresses and jewels. Lady Charnleigh was introduced to Madame Berton, who looked at her gravely, and then promised that she would do full justice to the radiant young beauty.

"I can foresee a perfect whirlpool of gayety," said Lady Fanshawe, as she looked at the number of cards of invitation; "you must be careful, Leonie, not to lose your roses in London."

But the girl was looking at the numerous invitations with a glorious smile on her face.

"Oh, auntie," she cried, clasping her hands, "is it not glorious? I long for the time. You say others tire. I never shall. It seems to me that I shall be young and gay and light-hearted forever."

And then Lady Fanshawe bethought herself that it was useless to preach, for experience is the great teacher, and the lovely, bright, hopeful girl would soon discover the truth for herself; so, from a number of cards she selected one.

"Lady Charnleigh," she said, "you must accept this one. It is an invitation to the Duchess of Rockhampton's ball; it is always the best of the season and it always takes place after the Drawing-room."

"And that will be my first ball," said the girl, laughingly—"the key to the golden land, the entrance to an earthly paradise! I wish it were to-night—I dislike waiting so long for anything."

Long afterward people talked of that drawing-room and the lovely young countess that drew all eyes and won all hearts. She was magnificently dressed; her costume was of the richest white silk, covered with silver net, and embroidered with silver flowers. With this she wore the far-famed Charnleigh diamonds. Young and old all agreed that no fairer debutante had ever appeared even at that Court, where fair and graceful women abound.

"I hope," she said to Lady Fanshawe, when they had reached home, and were resting in the cool, fragrant boudoir—"I hope I acquitted myself to your satisfaction. I tried to remember all you had told me."

"I have nothing more to teach you, Leonie; you are une grande dame now launched on the great world. Every one was charmed with you; I never saw a more complete success."

"Then I should be happy," said the Countess, with that peculiar smile which Lady Fanshawe never quite understood.

"Now rest. I shall not let you stir until it is time for the ball. You must look your brightest and best, Lady Charnleigh, for, although her Grace of Rockhampton is very popular, half the people there will have gone to see you."

When Lady Fanshawe saw her charge dressed that evening for the ball, she allowed to herself that she was perfect. The costume again was of white and silver, so appropriate always to fair and youthful beauty; the silver net was fastened with sprays of white heath, and the bouquet she carried was of her favorite flowers—sweet, white daphnes.

The Charnleigh diamonds adorned the golden head, carried with such queenly grace; they rose and fell like points of flame on the white breast, and one superb bracelet gleamed on the rounded arm. The lovely face was radiant in its youth and hope; it had a flush like the daintiest color of a rose-leaf; no stars were ever brighter than her eyes. The unstudied perfect grace of the whole figure was something to wonder at. She stood before the mirror in silence, and then, turning suddenly to Lady Fanshawe, she said:

"Do you know what forebodings are, auntie?"

"Weaknesses in which no sensible person ever indulges," was the grave reply.

"Sometimes they are more than that. I have a foreboding, auntie—a kind of presentiment that something is going to happen to-night."

"Something will happen; you will be very much admired, Leonie—nothing more than that."

"See, auntie, my hand trembles—I never saw my hand tremble before; and my heart beats, yet it is not from fear."

"You are excited with this morning's brilliant success, Leonie."

"Is that all?" she murmured. "I feel as though I were on the threshold of another world. It cannot be all fancy and imagination. What can happen to me? Nothing, for I have all I want."

She repeated these words as they drove through the sweet May night to Rockhampton House—"Nothing can happen to me—I have all I want."

CHAPTER XIII.

Leonie, Countess of Charnleigh, was queen of the ball. Fair women were present, but none so fair as she.

The Duchess of Rockhampton was anxious to give a most cordial welcome to her beautiful young guest. The former was considered—and justly so—the proudest and most exclusive woman in London. Yet she set herself to please Lady Charnleigh. She introduced her noblest guests to her; she brought her son, the heir of the house, Lord Falcon, to her; and people whispered that it would not be displeasing to her grace if the young lord should eventually win the fair heiress.

His grace of Rockhampton—who seldom wasted many minutes in talking to ladies—seemed enchanted with her. To those who understood such things it was very evident that a ducal coronet might in time fall to the lot of Leonie, Lady Charnleigh.

Everything was so novel to her that her thoughts did not run much either on love or lovers. To look at that most lovely and radiant face was enough to make one happy. Sweetest smiles rippled over the peaceful lips; the violet eyes shone like stars. She enjoyed herself, and was not ashamed of showing it. Lord Falcon was unwilling to leave her.

"I have never found a ball so pleasant as this," he said to her, and she looked at him with a smile.

"In all probabilty I shall never find another so pleasant; it is my first."

There came an interval between the dances.

"Have you seen the ferns grouped in the dining-room?" he asked her.

No, she had not seen them, and Lord Falcon, only too happy to have her to himself for a few minutes, led the way.

"My dear mother has but one decided mania," he said, as they walked through the broad, fragrant, brilliantly lighted corridor; "and that is for ferns. I do not care for them, but she sees something wonderful in them, and is supposed to have the finest collection in England; some of the best and most wonderful are grouped here. The duchess wished to make the world envious, I suppose."

The dining-room was lighted with innumerable wax tapers, which threw a soft, pearly light; and Leonie, standing among the ferns, made a lovely picture. At the other end of the room she saw a gentleman standing before a picture; he was evidently admiring or criticising it. Sometimes the grand statuesque attitude of that tall, stately figure struck her with admiration; he turned suddenly, and she saw a kingly Saxon head with fair clustering hair, and a fair, frank, handsome face.

It was the handsomest face, she thought to herself, that she had ever seen—such a face as women love and children trust, full of loyalty, of noble simplicity—a face that could be as tender as a woman's, yet stern and severe when need should be. With her quick fanciful imagination Lady Charnleigh made all men heroes.

A sudden desire seized her that the light of that face should be turned upon her, and then she became conscious that Lord Falcon had been speaking to her for some time, and her face flushed.

"I crave pardon, Lady Charnleigh; if your thoughts are really so far away that you cannot hear, I will not intrude."

"Pray pardon me," she said.

She was just going to add, "Who is that gentleman?" when she paused. It would not do to let Lord Falcon know how entirely her mind had been occupied with a stranger while he was by her side. Leonie, Lady Charnleigh, was growing worldly wise.

She was saved all further wonder by the stranger's suddenly catching a glimpse of Lord Falcon, upon which he came forward quickly, and the greeting between the two was warm and cordial. Then Lord Falcon introduced Sir Bertram Gordon to the Countess of Charnleigh, and a new life-drama was begun.

The grand Saxon head, with its clustering hair, was bent over her, and Leonie's face grew warm as two keen, clear eyes frankly met her own.

"I have heard so much and so often of you, Lady Charnleigh, that it gives me the greatest delight to meet you."

She was accustomed to compliments, but something in the ring of his voice told her he was speaking truth. Suddenly the soft, sweet strains of the "So daten Lieder" floated through the open doors. Lord Falcon looked at his companion.

"Lady Charnleigh, if I were fond of quotations I could use one now—'With thee conversing, I forget all time.' I am engaged for this dance to Miss Hylton, and it has begun—what shall I do?"

"Hasten to atone for your forgetfulness."

"And you?" he said. Sir Bertram at once stepped forward.

"If Lady Charnley will accept my escort, I shall feel most honored."

Her face flushed again, her hand trembled as it touched his arm. "What is coming to me?" thought the girl, impatiently. "Surely I am not growing nervous and awkward."

"Are you engaged for this waltz?" asked Sir Bertram, suddenly. And the next moment, as it seemed to her, she was floating round the room on the wings of a zephyr.

The strong arm clasped her, the handsome Saxon face was bending over her. What was it came so suddenly from his eyes to hers? A sweet, subtle something that she could not understand. Suddenly the sweet face grew pale; the vague, dreamy happiness was so great that it became painful.

"You are tired, Lady Charnleigh," said Sir Bertram; "you have grown very pale. Will you leave this warm room? I will find you a cool seat among the flowers."

She took his arm. Her senses were all in a whirl; she would have mechanically done anything he told her.

So they walked on in silence, all tremulous with happiness too sweet for words; and, as they went, the music appeared to grow softer, the lights brighter, the flowers more fair. It was but the dawn of love, and they were unconscious of it. They went through the long suit of brilliantly lighted rooms; then they heard the ripple of fountains, and Sir Bertram said:

"You will find that ten minutes here among the flowers will refresh you, Lady Charnleigh."

He placed a seat for her near a large stand of fragrant white daphnes. She looked at him with a smile.

"Did you guess that these were my favorite flowers?" she asked.

"No," he replied promptly.

"Well," confessed the young heiress, "I love the daphnes—they are full of poetry. The name has associations that I cannot explain, or even understand; and the perfume says more to me than the perfume of any other flower."

He was leaning against the white marble fountain, looking earnestly at her radiant, lovely face.

"I wish I were a daphne," he said.

"Then I should gather you and wear you, and then you would 'die,'" she returned.

"Happy in such a death! You would not throw me away, though, when I was dead—would you?"

"Of what use is a faded flower?" she asked, laughingly.

"I shall never see a daphne again without thinking of you," he said, and there fell upon them a golden silence more eloquent than words.

The ripple of the fountains, mingled with the distant sound of music, the fragrance of the odorous blossoms, the soft pearly light from the lamps, half-hidden in the green foliage, formed a poem in themselves.

What was coming to her? She who had bright, frank words for every one, whose smiles were easily won, who had never known fear, timidity, or shyness, could not raise her fair flushed face, dared not raise her eyes and look at her companion, and yet she felt and knew in some vague way that her silence told him more than words could have done.

He was quite content to stand there and drink in the beauty of that marvelous face, to watch the play of those exquisite features, the light and shade, the sweet girlish shrinking, the pretty shy embarrassment—he would have been quite content to watch that picture and forget everything else.

But he bethought himself at last; he must speak; it seemed hardly courteous to stand in silent, mute admiration before a lady for whose least word men contended as for a prize.

"I think the waltz is over," she said. "We must go; I am engaged for the next." Yet she would have given the world to remain.

"Your kindness makes me bold, Lady Charnleigh," he said; "I refuse to go until you have granted me a favor."

"What is it?" she asked.

"Will you give me a daphne—nay, not one of those growing there, but one from your bouquet? They have been in your hand, you have sighed over them, and that makes them more precious. Will you give me one?"

She hesitated for a minute, and then took the flower he asked for and gave it to him. He kissed it reverently.

"I shall keep that until I die," he said, "and then it shall be buried with me."

There was the sound of approaching footsteps, with the rustle of silken robes, and the next moment her grace of Rockhampton had joined them.

"My dear Lady Charnleigh, I am glad you have found time to rest;" and then her quick eyes noted the flower in Sir Bertram's hand, and a frown disturbed the calm serenity of her face.

"I am sorry you are tired," she continued, laying one hand caressingly on the young girl's shoulder, "but I cannot allow my ballroom to lose its fairest ornament. I have had several inquiries put to me about you."

Sir Bertram saw that he was de trop. Lord Falcon came and stood by his mother's side; there was no further opportunity for the baronet to speak.

"You promised me one quadrille, Lady Charnleigh," said Sir Bertram, as he went away—and it seemed to her that the light and fragrance went with him.

She tried to forget him while she listened to Lord Falcon, but her heart was still beating with that new-found happiness for which she knew no name.

The remainder of the evening passed like a dream; the homage offered to her, the countless compliments that she received, the music, the light, the flowers, were all part of a confused dream, from which she did not awaken until Sir Bertram came to claim her hand for the promised quadrille. She saw the white daphne in his coat, and she kept her eyes averted from him.

He lingered by her side until the carriage was called, and then Lord Falcon joined them. There was a slight contention without words between the two gentlemen as to who should conduct Lady Charnleigh to her carriage, but Sir Bertram won; her last word, her last smile was for him, and she drove away with the memory of his face haunting her.

An hour later and Lady Charnleigh was seated before her sumptuous toilet-table, her wealth of golden hair, all unbound, falling around him. She had laid aside her magnificent dress and costly jewels, the white daphnes had been carefully placed in a vase of water, and, dressed in a white negligee, she looked even more beautiful than in full dress.

She must have been tired, but no sleep came to her. She opened her window and looked out at the stars gleaming in the blue sky; the night wind was whispering in the trees; it was heavy with the dewy fragrance of mignonette.

"If we lived in days of magic, I should say he had cast a spell upon me," she said to herself; "I cannot forget him."

Never once during that long reverie did she think of Lord Falcon. Right well she loved rank, position and wealth—had a ducal coronet no charm for her? She only remembered Sir Bertram, his looks, his words. She kissed the fair white daphnes for his sake, and then blushed at what she had done. The last words which she remembered that night were those she had used herself—"What can marriage give me?"

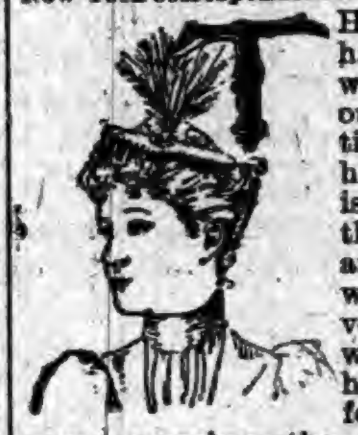
HOW TO MAKE HATS.

A FEW SUGGESTIONS TO AMATEUR MILLINERS.

If the Hat Is Just Right the Rest of a Woman's Costume Will Escape Without Serious Scrutiny—It Is Easy to Trim the Home-Made Article.

Have Many Hats.

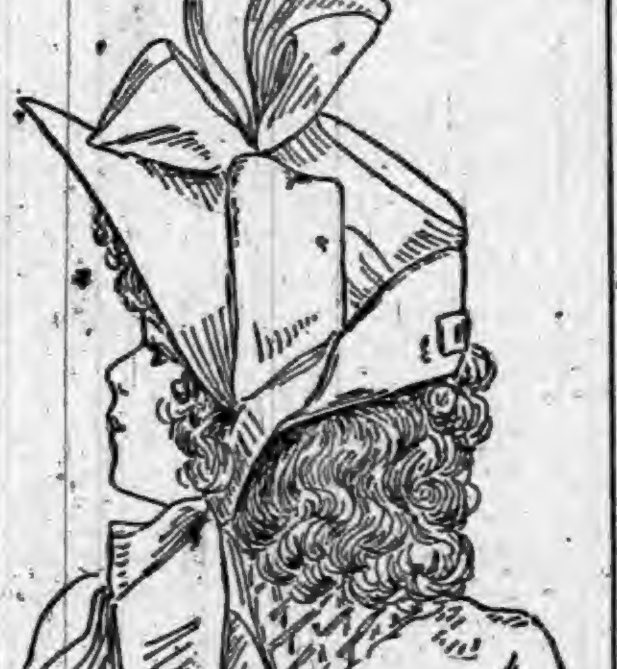
New York correspondence:



THE woman whose hat is just right will escape without serious scrutiny of the rest of her costume. This is a little secret that many a woman has discovered who spends not so very much on her wardrobe, and yet has a reputation for dressing. On many occasions the hat is all that really shows of the get-up. At the theater, for instance, and on any of the many sitting-down affairs a woman goes in for, it is better to have one gown and three hats than the reverse. You are probably making up your mind that hats cost so much that three hats to one gown is not going to be within any ordinary pocket-book's reach. Surely not if you get your hats made, but you mustn't. You must make them yourself, and here are some rules to help you.

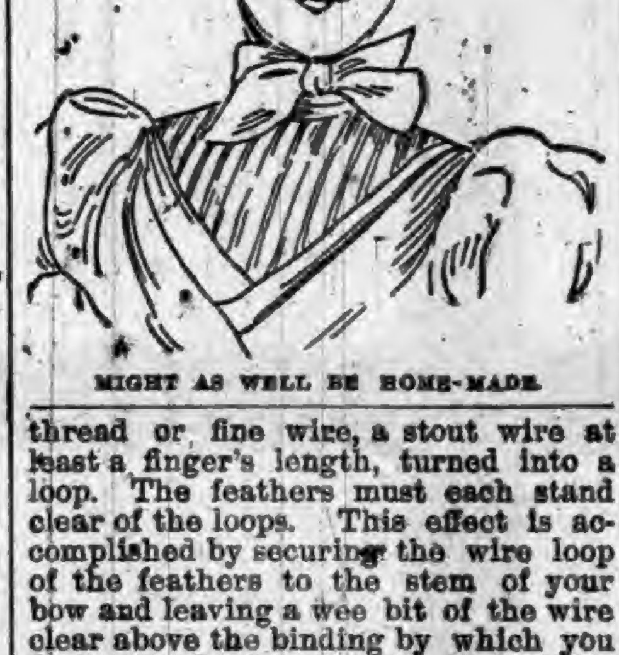
The amateur's hat is seldom large enough in the crown, it seldom fits well, and it always has too much on it. Avoid these faults and this one more: The amateur's hat is insecurely trimmed; I mean the bows wobble, the feathers don't seem to know their own minds, and the flowers are loose in the wrong place.

Now, having been told what not to do, attend to the things you must do. First, to trim a big hat, get it big enough in the crown. Make sure which is the front and which the back, and put a mark to designate the exact front and the exact back. For your first attempt you have selected a felt that does not need wiring about the brim. The fewer irregularities you give the brim the better. The bend upward just in front that is at present popular is secured by stitching the brim and the crown of the hat together very near the bottom. One stitch taken over and over and the end carefully secured does the work. The rosette or fancy pin put under the brim in such hats against the hair is to cover the stitch.



EASY TO TRIM.

Now decide where you want your bow. Don't try your hat on; it is not to be tried on till it is all done. Having settled in your mind where the bow will be, make it. Bows are big and many looped, and the loops stand independent and well clear of each other at the base. If your ribbon be light, use white wire; if dark, use black. Tape wire is best because you can stitch through it. Have lots of it all smooth, and straight. Make the first loop of the wire, pass the ribbon over the loop, making it snugly tight, then tie the ribbon and wire round and round at the base with good stout thread. Wind this first loop till it is all solid. Make another loop from the long end of the wire, pass more ribbon over, bind the new loops secure, and fasten the two loops safely together. Allow a little length of wire each time between the loops, so that when all the loops are made they will be bound together to a solid stem of the wire. Neither wire nor ribbon is to be cut till the whole bow is made, and a short piece of the wire should be left to assist in adjusting the bow to the hat. If a feather is to go with the bow, or if several feathers are to be added, now is the time to do it. Feathers at present are made wide at the top and narrow at the base. To the quill should be fastened securely, by winding round and round with thread or fine wire, a stout wire at least a finger's length, turned into a loop. The feathers must each stand clear of the loops. This effect is accomplished by securing the wire loop of the feathers to the stem of your bow and leaving a wee bit of the wire clear above the binding by which you fasten the feathers to the bow. Now you have the whole group that is to go on the hat made and firm and the whole cluster has a stem that is part of itself, and about half an inch long.

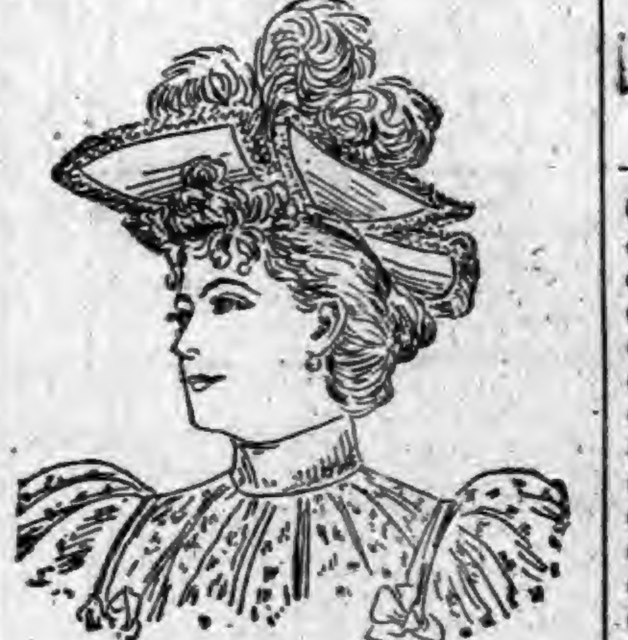


MIGHT AS WELL BE HOME-MADE.

If your hat is to have a band around the crown, lay your bow aside and attend to the band. Secure it smoothly and firmly. Better use ribbon, for velvet is so hard to make "set." The bow and feather or feathers are now to be fastened. Decide where it is to be placed. Set it so that the point where loops and feathers spring free of each other shall come about at the top of the hat, for, of course, you have chosen a low-crowned hat. The stem to your bow you fasten securely to the side of the hat crown. Sew over and over the stem, taking a good hold underneath each time. When the sewing is done, there should be no more wobble to the bow or the feathers than as if they and the hat were all made together, and so secure must the fastening and attaching of loops and feathers and all to each other be that you must now be able to bend single loops here and there as you like, without injuring the security of the whole in the least.

Therefore, in selecting the position for the bow you must also decide upon the angle at which to place it, because that angle cannot be modified once the bow is fast. Rosettes for beneath the brim in front and against the hair in back must be made firmly and all finished before they are put on. Then they must be applied with exactness and fastened with great care.

If the hat was a good size to start with, if you have trimmed it with due consideration for having the front of the hat come in front, if you selected a shape that suits you, and if the hat trimmed in your hand looks simple and ship-shape you may try it on. It is sure to look well. When you call at a swell millinery to select a hat you take one "ready-made," don't you? It is all nonsense to "try on" to see if the hat is going to be all right.

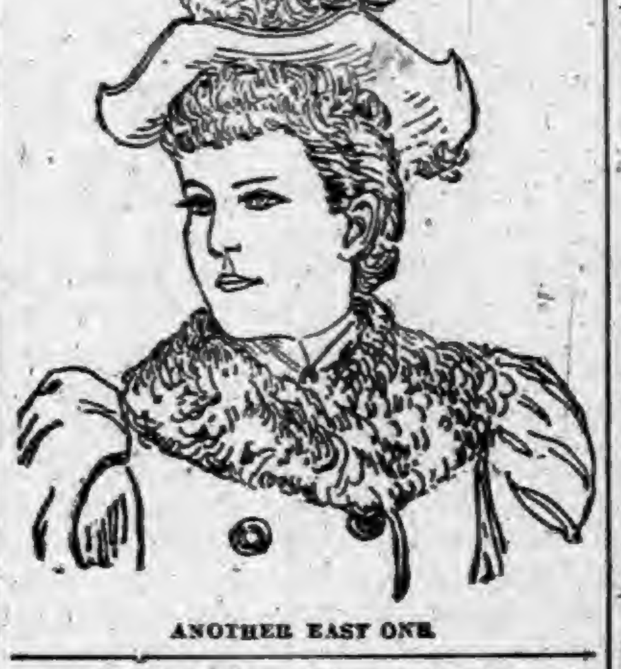


'TWILL TEST YOUR SKILL.

The secret of a pretty theater hat is almost all in having the crown big enough. To be big enough it must come easily and well down on the sides of the head. A good way to start your theater hat is to tie a band of ribbon very loosely around the head. Slip it off and sew stout wire to the outside of the ribbon circle. Let the ends of the wire lap over securely. Sew three rows of the wire to the ribbon, each round of wire lapped and tightly finished at the ends. If you mean to wind the wire, so the crown of your little theater hat will be like a twist of ribbon, you must make your foundation circle that much larger around to allow for the twisting of the ribbon. Two rosettes set in front and a little apart, and a couple of velvet points, faced with a contrasting silk and spreading to right and left, set right at the back and bound to the crown by a knot of velvet, make a pretty head-rig. Or you may set a little mercury wing on each side of the circle, and have a jeweled buckle and a tiny aigrette just in front. There are endless varieties, all pretty, and the main rule is make the crown big enough, let it be secure, and make your bows before you put them on.

Spangles are a great deal used just now. Felt hats have a row of spangles around the edge. These are mounted on a narrow beading of jet and lap over each other. Toques are often bordered with spangles; but in their case the spangles are mounted in a stiff band set vertically on the edge. Charming models appear with full crown of scarlet or fuchsia red velvet, encircled in this way. The trimming may be a cluster of black satin roses with jet hearts, or a rosette made of clipped cock's feathers, each feather brightened up with a dashing of jet braiding about the edge. In both cases a couple of quill feathers may be added or a pair of handsome jet pins.

There is a wide range of variety in the five hats sketched. First there is a small stringless bonnet having its pointed jet crown set on narrow bands of brown beaver. It is set off by a black military aigrette, shot with mauve pink shading to pale pink. Next comes a child's model made in light brown felt with bow and long strings of rose-colored satin ribbon. The third example is a theater hat composed of rose-colored geraniums and trimmed in front with three black velvet bows. A carriage hat in pale beige felt follows, the brim slashed picturesquely, as is now so much the vogue, and edged with black ostrich feathers and ecru guipure. It is trimmed with black ostrich tips, hold in place by a large velvet rosette, and smaller rosettes are put inside at the base of the cuts. The last specimen is a pretty modification of the harlequin hat and has the brim cut into points, each point being bent slightly upward. Made of Havana brown felt and trimmed with two black feathers, set near the edge, it becomes a very serviceable hat.



ANOTHER EASY ONE.

Instructions have not been given for the making of each of these widely differing models, and, indeed, the trimming of some of them would be all the amateur should attempt. But if you will once try to trim or make your own headwear, you will be so surprised and pleased by your success that your courage will rise till you feel equal to anything. It is mostly a matter of courage. Are you brave enough to go buy your material and begin?

Queer Superstition of an Emperor.

A curious story comes from Hayti. When Soulouque was emperor, about 35 years ago, a revolution broke out one night when he was asleep in his palace at Port au Prince. Awakened by the sound of musketry, without waiting to change his dress, Soulouque rushed down to the courtyard and leaped upon his horse. Being somewhat of a dandy, the Emperor was clad in a magnificent suit of silk pajamas which had been especially manufactured for him in Paris. Pushing forward with his men, he led the attack upon the insurgents, who, finally driven back, left their leader in the hands of the imperial troops. Still Soulouque lingered, and not until the execution of these men had been carried out on the Champ de Mars did he return to his palace and doff his novel uniform. Soulouque attributed his victory in a large measure to his pajamas, and they were an object of special interest in the palace for many years.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY.

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana, post-office as second-class matter.

THURSDAY....NOVEMBEB 16, 1893.

Now let us have a revision of the tariff and have it right soon after congress meets.

There are left on the pension rolls, 86 of the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812. Their ages vary from 87 to 105.

Veterans of the Black Hawk war, of 1832, are now applying for pensions under a recent law. It has been a long wait, and but few are left.

About 12,000 empty box cars were on the various sidetracks in Indianapolis, not long ago. Now, the prospect of business has taken them nearly all away.

People have had a chance to see what fine times the McKinley law would bring, when it is given full sway. Now let us revise the tariff on more sensible lines.

Indiana has 2,054 fourth-class postoffices, and of these, only 254 have been removed to make room for democrats. Where does the "clean sweep" complained of by republicans, come in?

Charles K. Harris, the Chicago man who wrote "After the Ball," was married last Sunday, to a young lady of that city. He said he had been greatly worried for fear the lady would get so tired hearing that song, that she would go back on him.

The mints are preparing to coin silver dollars again. This time it is under the new law, the first law enacted by democrats since before the war. And yet free silver men don't think any more of democrats than they do of republicans, the most of whom oppose silver money. Queer politics.

Republican papers, not being able to find much fault with Cleveland, are attacking his "Thanksgiving Proclamation." Any ordinary person reading it over, sees nothing unusual in it. But to the average republican editor, it is all wrong. It does some small minds a great deal of good to have some leader point out some real or imaginary fault of the president.

We have had our fill of "republican good times" for the past six months. Now give us a few years of democratic times by revising the tariff liberating the shackles of trade, commerce and manufactures, so that our mills will start up, our ships and our flag once more appear on the sea, from which republican pig-headedness drove them. Democrats in Congress, the people expect you to do a plain duty.

Republican papers are not satisfied with the democrats saying "we are not to blame for hard times, as we have done nothing." Republicans say perhaps that is where the trouble comes in, "we have done nothing." Well, as there is nothing to do, except to undo republican blunders, we might tackle that, and probably will. But we should think they would hate to own up that the most necessary thing we can do is to undo their make of laws. But that is about how the matter stands.

Wm. A. Beane, the well known editor of the Goshen Democrat, dropped dead of heart disease Tuesday. He had been connected with the Democrat about half a century, and for over thirty years controlled it. He was a man of kind and friendly nature, and held the love and esteem of all the publishers in this part of the state. He was, besides, a man of considerable ability as a writer, and no one has ever filled in a greater measure, the peculiar place he held in North Indiana newspaper circles, nor is it likely his equal will follow him. The fraternity, to a man will mourn for him.

Sandwich Islands may now settle down in peace. The U. S., government has concluded it has no right to interfere in their matters. The Queen will probably be restored to her throne, or at least permitted to take it if she wants it. This action on the part of our government has been expected for some time, as no one could show where we had any right to interfere with the affairs of an independent nation. There will be plenty of critics, however, who think Uncle Sam should have gobbled up the islands. But the same reasoning would apply to the British West India Islands. But we think no one will argue that we ought to tackle them. Because a nation is weak, is no excuse for doing it an injustice. If the Sandwich Islands want to join us, they can do it by a vote.

The Goshen Democrat last week had a very imperfect article about the murder of Copeland, and the execution of Scott, his slayer, at Laporte, in early days. Brother Beane, if you will correspond with Dr. H. B. Wilcox, Three Oaks, Mich., we believe you can get a finely written account of the affair. The Doctor was a guard, and carried a musket on that eventful day. The "hollow" is still plainly visible not far from where the main road going east out of Laporte, crosses the tracks of the Lake Erie and Western, and is on the south side of the wagon road. When a lad, we had the spot pointed out to us by Dr. Wilcox, and he brought our young imagination up to a high pitch by his graphic account of the first hanging. We think it was the only hanging the county ever had.

Truth About the Debt.

Republican papers are tearfully repeating "six millions a month deeper into debt goes the democratic administration." They are either ignorant or think their readers are. If the receipts are small and expenditures great, whose fault is it? The fault of republicans. Not a penny of this expense but is made in republican appropriation bills; not a penny of the money received to pay with, but is produced by republican laws for raising revenue. If the revenues have been short it is because republican laws, chiefly the McKinley law, would not produce money enough. If the expenses have been too great, it is because republican appropriations were too high. Now, why did not republicans give us lower appropriations or higher revenues? They could have done it, either one or both, and democrats urged them to do both, in order to be on the safe side, but they refused, though they were told there would be an increase of the debt. Now, they are trying to blame democrats. The editor or other man who lays the blame to democrats shows ignorance. The debt would have increased in Harrison's administration had he not used funds held for other purposes.

How Debts are Paid.

How debts are paid and all general business carried on by a sum of money many times smaller than the sum of the debt, or the amount of the business, is finely illustrated by the following little item taken from the Carrollton, Ill., Patriot:

If you can't pay all you owe, pay what you can. It will help out wonderfully in these pinching times. This illustration is said to have originated as a minstrel joke, but it's good sound doctrine at the present time, and is commended to our readers and patrons.:

A to B—Here is that dollar I owe you.

B to C—Here is that dollar I owe you.

C to A—Here is that dollar I owe you.

Thus the movements of one dollar cancel indebtedness amounting to six times its value, and so on, ad infinitum. The morals are too obvious to need a diagram.

There you see how it is done. Yet you will find on about every street corner some wild financier who will tell you that if the country owes two thousand millions, it must have that sum to pay it with. And if the country does annually a business that amounts to two-thousand millions, we must have that amount and nothing less to transact that much business. The facts are that those who talk loudest and most emphatically on financial questions are the people who know least about them.

Storm Prophet Hick's Paper.

Many persons know of Rev. Irl R. Hicks, the noted storm prophet, but are not so well acquainted with the fact that his monthly paper, "Word and Works," is one of the most attractive and instructive journals in America, and is doing more to educate the people in science, than any other. It not only contains Rev. Hicks' monthly forecasts, complete and unabridged, but also articles from his pen on astronomy and planetary meteorology, finely illustrated. There is a sermon or religious article in each number, a "Home, Sweet Home" department edited by a lady, a "Youth and Beauty" department for boys and girls, "Queries," for those who want hard nuts cracked, and many other good things. All this for the low price of $1 per year. All subscribers who pay for a year's subscription in advance before Feb. 1, 1894, will receive free, as a premium, Rev. Irl R. Hicks's Almanac for 1894. This book alone is well worth the subscription price. Send six cents for a sample copy of the paper, or send $1 for a year's subscription to "Word and Work" Pub Co., St. Louis, Mo. 46

Obituary.

Nicholas Wierman was born in Adams county, Pennsylvania, March 30, 1811, and died Nov. 7, 1893, aged 82 years, 7 months and 7 days He was the last of a family of nine children.

Brother Wierman emigrated to Ashland county, Ohio in 1833, and from there to Corunna, DeDalb county, Indiana, in 1880.

He joined the M. E. church in 1854, and has always been a devoted christian to the last. He leaves a wife and four children to mourn his death.

The funeral services were held in the M. E. church at Corunna, Dr. Woolpert and Rev. J. A. Sumwalt officiating. The interment was in the Kendallville cemetery under the "Rites" of Masonry.

They Get Wild.

The Hudson World fairly gets wild over the elections of last week. It says,

"The promise of more money and a more money policy, such as would enable people to pay their debts, was met by Cleveland in the most open violation of law and right."

Now, who "promised more money" or a "more money policy?" Surely there is no hint of such a thing in the democratic national platform, although we believe the policy of this administration will be towards increasing the amount of money in actual use. In fact, this administration has already coined about twenty millions in gold that would not have been coined by its predecessors. And it has just done away with the Sherman act which prohibited the coinage of any silver dollars, and has put in its place a provision for manufacturing at least a part of the silver in the treasury into dollars. The mints are at this hour booming with activity getting ready for the making of "more money." In fact, the democracy is doing more than it promised. And it will likely continue this sensible policy as long as good judgment dictates.

Again, we ask the "World" as to the second charge, that Cleveland has been guilty "of the most open violations of law and right." Even if Cleveland made an unwise appointment, which we believe he did, yet no one can deny but he had a "right" to do so. The Hudson World may not be any wilder than some others, but an answer to the World's statements will help to enlighten a great many others. There was a grand defeat for democrats in most of the states, but the people generally voted under the same misapprehension of facts as indicated in the "World's" article. But they were simply mistaken. Democrats do not wish to take away the pensions; do not wish to stop factories, but to build them up; do not wish to make hard times, but better times; do not wish to kill silver, but to bring it to life and use at least a part of it for money; in brief, democrats are the friends of silver, though they are not all in favor of free coinage. They will, if permitted, do better by silver and by the people, than the ultra and extreme men would if allowed to have their own way.

Lost Children in Big Stores.

"Are many babies lost in the big stores?"

The floor walker stood beside a number of bolts of cloth. It was in one of the big stores in Fourteenth street.

"Come with me," he said.

When we had arrived at the rear of the store he carefully opened a door leading to a small room. There, on a soft lounge, all cuddled up, asleep and evidently dreaming, was a dear child with golden hair.

"The child," exclaimed the floor walker, "belongs to some woman now shopping in this place. She is wandering around from counter to counter and has temporarily forgotten her dear little Willie. We found the child asleep near the elevator, tired out apparently."

"And you will take care of it till she comes back, eh?"

"We will. We have a number of children to look after each day. Some are lost, some forgotten, but the mammas all come back in due season."

Just then there was a suppressed ejaculation at the door, something that sounded like:

"Oh, my deardarlingchildchildchild!"

A woman bounded into the room. Such kissing, such hugging, you never saw in all your born days!

"It was like this," the woman said. "I left the dear boy just one tiny minute to look at some bargains in laces. Then Mrs. Gamp came up, and of course I had to talk to her. Time slipped by; it was most an hour before I ever thought of dear little Willie again."

"Well," said the floor walker smiling, "he is safe."

Then the woman went away with her prize, saying something at each step that sounded like:

A Ride with Senator Wolcott.

Upon an occasion some years ago a friend took Senator Wolcott for a drive in the suburbs of Leadville, and Wolcott expressed a suspicion that the horses were perhaps too frisky to be trustworthy. Thereupon the friend set about bantering and badgering Wolcott upon his excessive timidity. Wolcott bore this badinage patiently, till presently they began to descend one of those steep, almost precipitous inclines in which Colorado roads abound.

"Will you let me drive?" asked Wolcott.

"Certainly," answered the other.

But no sooner had Wolcott got the reins than he turned to his companion and said: "You have been shaming me for my timidity. My turn has come. We'll see who squeals first!"

With that he flung the reins out over the horses' backs and began plying the whip furiously. The frightened horses dashed down the hill, swinging the buggy around curves and against bowlders in such wise as to threaten its demolition. Wolcott continued to ply the whip and to shout at the maddened brutes. His friend clung, white and trembling, to his seat. It is a marvel that both were not killed. Finally the buggy was overturned, the horses broke away and Wolcott and his friend were left in a confused heap, with a broken arm, a sprained ankle and a dozen body cuts and bruises between them.

"Well, how do you like it?" asked Wolcott, gathering himself together and emerging nimbly from the debris.

The other answered feebly but proudly, "I hain't squealed yet!"—Chicago News-Record.

Taxes are about in. We are told that in spite of hard times there will be no more failures to get in on time, than usual. The last call of the treasury shows how near up they are called.

Uncle John Carper was in town last Thursday enjoying a Chicago distemper cold. He and the COURIER editor got together and compared notes, though there was little to comfort either one.

Frank N. Beidler, of Waterloo, is now a salesman with Schaab Brothers. He has had a life long experience in this line of business, and will make a popular clerk in that popular establishment.

Our new school house is a thing of beauty and of joy to the teachers, pupils, parents and school board. It will be all enclosed by the time cold weather se's in. Our people should go down that way and see it.

Frank Rush has sold his barn to W. A. Thomas, who will move it to his lot near John Knoder's. It is a new, well built and neat building, and can be used for almost any purpose. We hear it mentioned that Mr. Thomas may start a cracker factory. We do not see why it would not be a paying thing.

Jacob Bishop, of Butler township, was here yesteday. He brought word of the burning of Mrs. Sarah Baltz's house the day before—Tuesday. This unfortunate occurrence was seven years, to a day, since their first dwelling house burned, and exactly two years from the burning of their barn. We hope these coincidences will not continue.

W. H. Kiblinger started south last week on a trip for rest and health. He will include in his travels, Tennessee, Mississippi, and other points south and southwest. We hope to see him return greatly improved. Indeed, with many other friends, we have urged him to do this for some time, and to remain at the south many months, for we believe it would result in a permanent benefit. But we hope a limited stay will prove beneficial. He has for many years devoted himself so closely to his great business interests, that his health has seriously suffered, but he has never felt that his personal oversight could be spared. We think however, that he has a force of assistants that could do very well, and make the business prosperous on its present footing anyhow. At all events we hope he will come home strengthened and re-invigorated for the cares which must fall on him. On Sunday a telegram was received stating that he had reached Elizabethton, Tenn., all right. He has relatives there, and we presume will remain there for a time.

A man in South Bend, had his chickens stolen a few days ago, about a dozen in all. But he found a pocket book containing $100, which the thief had dropped. A similar thing happened in this county, not so very long ago. Still this particular part of the chicken stealing industry is not sufficiently reliable to make it safe to leave the coop door open.

There are still several hundreds of our subscribers who have allowed their subscriptions to get two or three, or more years behind, and we have waited on them patiently since the hard times began a year ago last May. Now we think each ought to make an extra effort to square up. Waiting on so many has been a serious drawback to us, and now let us take a business view of it and get even or partly even.

Someone wanted corn Tuesday night and wanted it badly. They pried off the staple of Geo. Apple's corn crib and probably got what corn they wanted, as there were evidences that they loaded it into a wagon near by. About 15 bushels were spilled out on the ground and found the next morning by Elmer Miller, Mr. Apple's son-in-law. He was alone that night, as his wife and Mr. Apple were visiting at Angola.

Laporte Argus:—A farmer of this county had some money deposited in the banks of this city, when the panic began. He suddenly became alarmed and without the slightest investigation or cause, rushed in and demanded his money. It was given to him and he has since held it. Now he wants to deposit it again and the banks refuse to take it. They don't want scare money. It is such people as this farmer that start panics and ruin thousands of business men without the slightest cause.

STATISTICS show that the entire agriculture of the world furnishes employment to 280,000,000 men, and represents an invested capital of $224,000,000,000. The annual product is worth over $20,000,000,000. It is estimated that the civilized nations pay annually for food $13,000,000,000.

ARTHUR ELDER NELSON, who died recently in New York, is said to have made $12,000 a year writing blood and thunder Indian novels for cheap publications. PERHAPS Mr. Charles Mitchell, the British slugger, could be induced to favor us with a lecture on the duty of the Christian clergy to the prize ring. Mr. Mitchell holds that when preachers inveigh against prize fighting they not only talk of that concerning which they are uninformed, but that they are not strictly attending to their own business. This is an important point.

IT isn't exactly clear why the Englishmen should indulge in the boast that the Valkyrie can cross the ocean and the Vigilant can not. As we understand the matter, there is no occasion for an American cup defender to cross the ocean. The cup is on this side of the water at present, and it seems likely to remain here for some time to come. When the cup goes abroad we shall have a yacht that will be entirely capable of crossing over to bring it back.

FOUR men, three of them telegraph operators and one an employe of a Kentucky lottery firm, got up a scheme to put a wire in a room next to the office and by signals furnish the operator with the numbers as they were taken from the wheel. These numbers were to be telegraphed to New York and played there before the eastern lottery office received the lucky numbers from the western office. The telegraph men were arrested, but the lottery man escaped. The latter was too deep in crime for the officers. It takes a smart man to beat lottery criminals. Let lotteries alone!

THERE seems to be a reform needed in men's attire, but no one is willing to make the first innovation. The dress coat of society, for instance, is a ridiculous garment, but who would dare to go into society without it? As for the civilized trousers it is as absurd and hideous a piece of raiment as could well be imagined, but what kind of attire could take its place? He would indeed be a bold man who would walk the streets without trousers, wearing instead the Highlander's kilt or the more classic toga. To wear either garment in the bleak northern winter would be a trial of physical courage which very few modern men could stand.

CHICAGO HERALD: Several hundred wise men of Gotham came out here the other day and viewed the landscape o'er. They nearly dislocated their necks gazing up at the sky scrapers, and they held on with both hands while they whizzed through the tunnels on cars drawn by Mr. Yerkes' justly celebrated cables. They took a journey—a day's ride—from Lake View to the southern city limits, and they got tired before they made the trip from the lake to the western boundary line. What they saw scared them, and they no sooner got home than they passed the word along that Brooklyn must be annexed if New York would be spared the disgrace of becoming the second city in the Union—Chicago being the first. This is flattering to Chicago, and the annexation movement gives us no concern. Within five years the population of this city will be greater than that of New York and Brooklyn combined. And if the worst comes to the worst we will annex Milwaukee.

ONE prolific cause of disaster to ocean vessels is likely to be obviated before long. That is, the difficulty that mariners experience in seeing or distinguishing coast lights on stormy or foggy nights. Many wrecks on the Long Island and New Jersey shores have resulted from this cause. But electric science is bring relief. It has been demonstrated that lighthouses are practical with electric apparatus capable of projecting light a distance equal to several hours' sail of average craft. A lighthouse is about to be erected at a point on the northwest coast of France that will illustrate the wonders of the new method. It will contain what is termed a "lightning flash" of forty million candle-power, and will cast a beam that in clear weather can be seen sixty-three miles away. Even in foggy weather it is expected to be visible at a distance of twenty-one miles.

A BILL has been introducd in Congress designed to punish train robbers. It holds guilty of murder any one who displaces or removes a railway switch, crosstie, or rail, or injures a railroad track or bridge, or does or causes to be done any act whereby a locomotive, car, or train of cars is stopped, obstructed, or injured with intent to rob or injure persons or property passing over any railroad, and whereby any person is killed. If the attempt does not result in murder, the guilty person shall be imprisoned at hard labor for from one to twenty years. Circuit and district courts of the United States are to have jurisdiction in all cases arising under the act. The bill has been referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The bill led to a lively discussion of the old States rights problem. Senator Vest denounced the bill as an attempt of great corporations to get the United States to protect their property. Senators Hawley and Dolph took the same view of the matter, saying that the whole nation was a failure if States could not be relied upon to maintain order within their borders. "No State," said Senator Hawley, "has a right to be powerless."

FRANCE has lost one of her great men, a man who represented her proudest periods of military achievement, and her most terrible disaster under the empire. Marshal MacMahon has earned honorably the right to be classed among the grand old men of France. He was buried with all the honors due him for his long military career, which began in Algeria and ended at Sedan, and for the high position he occupied as President of the republic. MacMahon was an honest President. He left the Elysee, where he had dwelt as lord of French taxes, with clean hands. In the sternness of his probity he resembled Washington. He discharged the duties of his great office in the spirit with which he entered upon them—a spirit embodied in these memorable words to the French Assembly in 1873: "A heavy responsibility is thrust upon my patriotism, but with the aid of God, the devotion of the army—which will always be the army of the law—and the support of all honest men we will continue together the work of maintaining peace, restoring moral order and defending the principles on which society is based." He never fell short of entire devotion to this great ideal.

THE latest terror of society is the peripatetic hypnotizer, who, according to the European newspapers, seems to be creating widespread consternation in England and on the Continent. In London recently a victim of hypnotism applied to a police magistrate for a summons against a man whom he charged with having caused him to reveal his confidential family affairs at a public house bar. Of course, his application was refused, since it is obvious that neither theft, fraud, imposition, libel nor assault could be accepted as the proper designation of such an incident. On the Continent the danger appears to be of a still more serious nature. A man with fascinating eyes is reported as haunting the Parisian omnibuses, and whenever he feasts his eyes on a good-looking young woman she immediately falls asleep. So numerous are the charges of this character against him that the police are now straining every nerve to capture him. But it is difficult to say what can be done with him when he is secured. He can scarcely be guillotined, and to place such an offender in confinement would only be to invite him to try his powers on his jailers. He might even succeed in sending to sleep the judge and the jury before whom he was brought for trial. If there is really anything in this new form of the Evil Eye, it may become a source of moral danger and crime, and the law of all civilized countries will have to be amended in such a manner as to grapple with it. In the meantime it may serve as a fertile field for authors of comic operas and screaming farces.

Dangers of the Tea Habit.

The London Hospital has been sounding a note of alarm regarding the extent to which the habit of tea-drinking is indulged; no less a quantity than 207,055,679 pounds having been consumed in Great Britain last year. This paper states that "not only are we yielding, with all the weakness of an inebriate, to the diseases of nerve and stomach which excessive tea-drinking brings in its train;" but, after instituting a comparison between teas of Chinese and Indian growth, it continues: "We drink more tea than our parents; we take it oftener, stronger, and of coarser quality. The results are less obvious than those of alcoholic intoxication, but not less serious; and in truth the time may not be far distant when the earnest disciples of the new temperance will plead with us, with tears in their eyes, 'Give up this accursed tea, and take to cocoa, or even to beer.'"

LABOR NOT DEFENDED

A FRAUD IMPOSED UPON THE WORKINGMEN.

Men Are on the Free List and American Labor Is Not Protected by Duties on Goods—Canadians Moving Back and Forth at Will.

Protective System a Farce.

"One effect of the temporary shutting down of the many New England cotton mills during the past two months and the subsequent reduction in the wages of the operatives has been the stimulus given emigration from this and other New England States to Canada. Few factories but have felt the effects of this exodus of the French Canadians back to the farms from which the promise of high wages and speedy enrichment enticed them, and for weeks past the depot platforms at the village railway stations have been piled high with their trunks and huge boxes, filled with clothing and household goods, billed for points beyond the Canadian border. There is no more reliable indicator of the industrial situation in the cotton manufacturing centers than the periodical movement of the migratory portion of the French Canadian population. When the tide of industrial prosperity is on the rise, and with it the wages of the cotton operatives, the French Canadian, taking it at the flood, hies him from the farm to the factory, and again when it begins to ebb, he is the first to take alarm, and with the accumulated savings of his sojourn in the States fly back to the farm."

The above, from the Providence Journal, is quoted by the Manufacturer, of Philadelphia, one of the stanchest, not to say the most bitter, of Protectionist journals. It is assumed that this furnishes a clinching argument for protection to American wage-earners by means of tariff duties. But does it? Does it not rather stamp the whole system as a farce and a fraud? Does it not make clear that trade in labor is free, and that when the reward for labor is higher in this than in other countries there is no obstruction to its migration and importation, except the trouble of moving and the expense of transportation? Not more certainly does the liquid in a spirit level flow toward the lower end of the tube than does the tide of immigration flow toward the country of greatest natural and actual advantages for the employment of labor. Labor, like water, is constantly seeking its level. Men being on the free list, they can and do sell their labor in the highest market. Hence wages the world over are about as nearly level as are the waters of the seas and the great bodies of water closely connected with them. If day wages are much higher in one country than in another it is because labor is more efficient in the former than in the latter country. This theory is in accord not only with common sense, but with all well-authenticated facts, obtained by Democrats or Republicans.

When James G. Blaine was Secretary of State in 1881, he made a report on wages in the cotton industry, in this and other countries, based upon statistics obtained by foreign Consuls. He was forced to come to the conclusion that "undoubtedly the inequalities in the wages of English and American operatives are more than equalized by the greater efficiency of the latter and their longer hours of labor." The previous Secretary of State, Wm. M. Evarts, made a similar report and came to a similar conclusion. He said: "One workman in the United States, as will be seen from the foregoing extracts, does as much work as two workmen in most of the countries of Europe."

That labor is more efficient in this country is demonstrated every day of the year by our exports of goods to all parts of the globe. Our shoemakers, carpet and cloth weavers, piano, carriage, and wagon makers, and mechanics and workingmen of all kinds receive double the day wages paid in Europe, and yet their products are exported to Europe and sold in competition with the products of Europe's cheapest labor. Many large manufacturers have declared that labor is cheaper in this than in any other country—all things considered. No, a duty on goods gives no protection to labor that makes the goods. As the Hon. Ben Butterworth frankly admitted, "The manufacturers and the trusts get the protection and the profits of the tariff." The American workingman sees the effects of protection in the increased prices of what he purchases. His labor is in constant competition with the labor of all other countries, both in our own and in foreign markets. This fallacy exploded, protection will have no other leg upon which to stand. But anyway it has twice been knocked completely off its pins in this country, and the last obsequies are now being performed. No humbug ever deserved to be buried deeper than this one.—Byron W. Holt.

The Inevitable Off Year.

The most conspicuous feature in American politics is the fated off year. A striking reaction is as certain to follow the victory of either party at the polls as day is to follow night. During the years following the war, with disfranchised white communities at the South and under federal force acts in all the States, the reactions were less complete. But even then, with a restricted suffrage and with the relentless exercise of official power at the polls, the off years produced a falling off in party majorities, and often they were reversed.

It is unnecessary to trace this line in political history farther back than the middle of the century. In 1848 the Whigs elected President Taylor, and in 1850 the Democrats elected a majority in Congress. In 1852 the Democrats elected Pierce, and in 1854 all factions of the opposition elected a majority in Congress. In 1856 the Democrats elected Buchanan as President, and in 1858 the Republicans elected a majority in congress. In 1860 Lincoln was elected President, but in 1862 there was a serious revulsion, and at the north, notwithstanding the prevalence of the war spirit, the Republicans met serious reverses. In 1872 Grant was elected President the second time, but in 1874 the Democrats elected a majority in Congress. In 1876 Tilden was elected President, though not inaugurated, with a Democratic Congress. In 1878 the Republicans elected a majority in Congress—all these elections relating to the House. More recent history is too familiar to require recapitulation.

The result in New York need not be a surprise. It is the most fickle State in the Union. It is liable to swerve from side to side, reaching the farthest extremes in a year to two. In 1880 the Republican majority in that State for Garfield as President was 21,000. In 1882, with Grover Cleveland for Governor, the Democratic majority was 193,000. In 1884 it was carried by Cleveland for President with but 1,047 majority. In 1888 it gave 21,000 Republican majority on President and 13,000 Democratic majority on Governor. In 1892 the Democratic majority was 45,000, and if it is as much the other way this year it should not be a cause for surprise.

Frequent mutations in politics occur in other States. In 1888 Pennsylvania gave 80,000 majority for President Harrison and in 1890 a Democratic Governor was elected. In 1884 New Jersey gave 4,500 Democratic majority, and in 1887 gave 3,600 Republican majority. In 1888 Wisconsin gave 21,000 Republican majority, and in 1890 George W. Peck was elected Governor by the Democrats with 35,000 majority. The political ups and downs are so numerous and so erratic that, except in a few States, the result of no general election indicates what may occur in an off year, and the result in an off year does not indicate the result of a general election.

The general law of reaction in all political movements is an added force which makes the off year an adverse forecast in the horoscope of all successful parties.—Chicago Herald.

About the Plate.

In the latest issue of the Iron Age the price of the standard grade of tin plate in this market is reported to be $5.40 per box. In the same issue the price of this grade of tin plate at Liverpool, free on board for shipment, is reported by cable to be from $2.79 to $2.85 per box. The duty on a box of this tin plate, weighing 108 pounds, is $2.37. It will be seen that the price in this market exceeds by at least 18 cents the price in Liverpool with the duty added, and that the duty of 2 2-10 cents per pound is equivalent to an ad valorem rate of 83 per cent.

The consumer who buys tin plate now in this market pays the Liverpool price, which is from $2.79 to $2.85; then pays the duty, which is $2.37, and adds from 18 to 24 cents per box for freight charges and importer's profits.

In its report of the markets, Tin and Terne, the organ of the Tin Plate Manufacturers' Association, said, on the 5th inst.: "Prices are getting down toward the lowest point ever reached in this country for foreign plates." There was no foundation for that assertion. The price now, as we have said, is $5.40, as reported by the leading trade journals. This exceeds by 26 per cent. the average price for the year 1886, and by 23 per cent. the average for the five years immediately preceding the year of the passage of the McKinley tariff. The average was $4.27 for the year 1886, and for the five years ending with 1889 it was $4.36.

We have been unable to find trade quotations of the prices of domestic tin plate except in the columns of this organ of the association, Tin and Terne, which publishes the price lists of five manufacturers. We have compared with the price of the imported tin plate—Bessemer steel, coke finish, IC, 14x20, full weight—the prices of the domestic tin plate of the corresponding denomination and size as published in that journal. The lowest price quoted for one factory is $6.75; for another the price ranges between $6 and $9; for the third prices are $6.25 and $9; for the fourth the lowest price is $5.75 and the highest $8.25, and the fifth concern offers three brands at $5.75, $6.25 and $6.75, respectively.

It will be noticed that the lowest of these prices exceeds by 35 cents a box the price of foreign tin plate in this market, although the price of this imported tin plate includes a tariff tax of $2.37. It should not be overlooked that the prices we have quoted are taken from the official organ of Mr. Cronemeyer's association.—New York Times.

The People Not Deceived.

Ignorant men who do not read or think for themselves, or who are satisfied to let interested parties think for them, may be caught in the net thrown out by the tariff shriekers and dragged back into the bondage from which they have just escaped; but they are not likely, once having had their eyes opened, to remain satisfied with future blindness and helplessness. The hard times and low wages which the oppressive McKinley tariff was ineffectual to prevent, it would prove equally ineffectual to obviate if it should remain unrepealed. As a revenue measure its working has brought the country to the edge of a deficit that is without a parallel for financial blundering in the past history of the Union in time of peace. Tariff Reform will justify itself. The people who control the destinies of the United States will not be balked in their effort to give the country commercial and industrial emancipation and to start it forward once more in the track toward supereminence among the nations from which it was temporarily thrust by the upheaval of civil war.—Philadelphia Record.

Too Many Axes to Grind.

If current rumors, emanating from Washington, as to the intentions of the Ways and Means Committee are correct, the New England free raw material advocate is not likely to realize his full expectations. It is very generally admitted that wool will be placed on the free list, but report has it that coal is to be singled out and provided with a coat of protection. If this is so, we do not wonder that Mr. Stevens has entered violent exceptions to it. Possibly the committee may regard free wool as a concession to the New England manufacturer, and hold that so long as the wool and woolen schedule is arranged to his liking he has been granted all that he can justly ask for. Then there is another suggestion. William Wilson lives in West Virginia, a State which produces a large quantity of bituminous coal; coal is also found in large quantities in many of the States from which comes the bulk of the majority in Congress. An impartial and non-sectional tariff seems beyond the range of either party.—Wool and Cotton Reporter.

"Regulating Wages."

Of all the impudent pretenses made before the Ways and Means Committee by a Fall River manufacturer, this was the worst: "You have it in your power to regulate the wages of our employes," he said. "Will you give them bread or a stone?" So good a protectionist as James G. Blaine certified, when Secretary of State, that the labor cost in cotton manufactures in this country was no higher than in England, owing to the greater productiveness of our operatives. But aside from this the Fall River mills have reduced wages whenever they dared and raised them only when they must. The supporters of the McKinley bill had a chance to "regulate wages" when an amendment to their bill was offered making the increases in duty conditional upon a corresponding increase in wages. Of course, they promptly voted it down. The monopolists who paid for the increase proposed to get their money back! They reduced wages in ten instances where they increased them in one.—New York World.

Their Products Must Be Free.

The contract labor law has not prevented the Carnegies and Fricks from filling up their works with aliens. It has not prevented the Pennsylvania coal monopolists from importing their thousands of miners. It has not kept out the regiments of Hungarians and Italians who compete for starvation wages on public works. It has not prevented the extinction of the race of New England fishermen whose places are now occupied by British provincials.—Chicago Free-Trader.

EVERY day is a little life.—Bishop Hall.

ALL HIS CROPS FAILED.

A New Hampshire Granger Not Satisfied Even with His Children.

A gentleman who was rusticating in the northern part of New Hampshire took a tramp among the hills one day recently. In passing a hillside farm he saw an aged granger hoeing a very stony potato-field near his house, and the gentleman stopped to converse with him.

"Your potatoes seem to be doing well," he started in.

"Oh, I reckon I'll hev a few pertaters," rejoined the farmer dryly, as he stopped hoeing the rocks off the vines and glanced at the stranger curiously from under the wide brim of his weather-beaten straw hat.

"Other crops good?"

"Oh, the crops is jest tolerible, as usual, I s'pose," replied the farmer indifferently, as he came up to the rail fence dragging his hoe after him. "But I'll tell yer jest how 'tis, squire," he continued confidentially. "I'm the most unfortunit ole critter in Coos County."

"Farming doesn't pay very well up here, I suppose?"

"Pay! Nothin' pays me, 'squire, but I did expect a leetle of suthen from my crop of young uns."

"Children turned out bad, eh?"

"Jes' so, stranger. The hull on 'em has been a dead loss to me. Dan'l—I named him for Dan'l Webster an' give him a good eddication—he's a hoss doctor; practiced on my old mare, an' she died. Zeke went inter what they call the green goods business—keepin' a grocery store, I s'pose—but he busted up, an' he writes me he's now working in a place called Sing Sing, says he's got a good, stiddy job, but the pay ain't good and he's allers wantin' to borrer a dollar from me. Sam an' Hi went ter brakin' on the railroad, an' I had ter pay the funeral expenses of both of 'em. Maria Ann got married to a drummer at the county fair last fall, an' went up in a balloon, but they came down safe, an' hev ben honeymoonin' with me an' the old woman ever since. Lizy, my youngest, ain't wuth her keep, an' she's a teasin' me to buy her a bysuckle—me, who hain't laid eyes on a five-dollar note sence the war. I tell yer stranger, I'm the most unfortunit old critter with my young ones that ever lived," he groaned.

"You certainly have had bad luck with your children."

"I should say I had. Now, there's Bill Durkee up ter Colebrook; he's had the greatest luck with his. They supports him in good style, and Bill hain't done a stroke o' work fur five years."

"All smart and steady, eh?"

"That's where you miss it, 'squire: they ain't any on um taken that way."

"How is it they get along so well, then?"

"They are all freaks, an' have all got good stiddy jobs the year around. Sal weighs 'bout a ton. Mirandy's got tremendous long hair an' his oldest boy was born without legs. An' here I be without even a mammoth hog or a two-headed calf," sighed the aged farmer as he went back to his hoeing.

Trial of the Pyx.

The annual ceremony of testing the standard fineness of the gold and silver coins of the United States, as well as those of Great Britain, is called the "trial of the pyx." The custom is very ancient, and the name is derived from the "pyx," or chest, in which the coin reserved for examination were formerly kept. In the United States the trial, which is provided for by law, is made on the second Wednesday of each recurring February before the Judge of the United States District Court, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Assayer of the New York Assay office and such other persons as the President may designate. A majority of the persons constitute a competent board, and the examination is made in the presence of the Director of the Mint.

The coins thus reserved for trial are made up from those selected from each delivery made by the chief coiner, deposited in the "pyx" and kept under the joint care of the Superintendent of the Mint and the Chief Assayer, each of whom has his separate lock and key.

Coins from other mints are transmitted quarterly for examination to the Director of the Mint, or in lieu of this he may test any piece which falls into his hands. The examiners detailed to make a "trial of the pyx" are not sworn, but they make a certified report of their doings. If this report shows the coins to be within the limit of tolerance in fineness and weight, it is filed. If not, the fact is certified to the President, and if he should deem it proper so to do he may order all those implicated in the error to be thenceforth disqualified from holding office.

Lucy Stone's Early Trials.

Many and varied are the stories told of the opposition and obstacles with which Lucy Stone was surrounded on every hand when she began her endeavors in behalf of equal suffrage. She had no co-operation and support, and started out entirely alone. She put up the posters for her own meetings, with a little package of tacks and a stone picked up from the street. Sometimes the boys would follow her, hooting and preparing to tear down the posters. Then she would stop, and, calling the boys about her, would hold a preliminary meeting in the street, until she had won the boys all over and persuaded them to let her posters alone.

At one time she was to speak at an anti-slavery meeting in the Public Hall of a suburb of Boston, together with William Lloyd Garrison and others. It had been requested that notices of the meeting should be given from the church pulpits on Sunday morning, and the minister of the orthodox church, in announcing that she was to speak, held up the paper on which the notice was written and said in a loud voice:

"A hen will attempt to crow like a cock in the town hall at 4 o'clock this afternoon. Those who enjoy that kind of music will attend the meeting."—Boston Globe.

WEAK MAN
CURE YOURSELF IN TWO WEEKS.

Why waste time, money and health with "doctors" wonderful "cure-alls," specifics, etc., when I will send FREE the prescription of a new and positive remedy for the prompt, lasting cure of Lost Manhood, Nightly Emissions, Nervous Weakness in old or young men, Varicocele, Impotency, and to enlarge weak, stunted organs. Cures in Two Weeks. I send this prescription Free of charge, and there is no humbug or advertising catch about it. Any good druggist or physician can put it up for you, as everything is plain and simple. All I ask in return is that you will buy a small quantity of the remedy from me direct, or advise your friends to do so after you receive the recipe and see that there is no humbug or deception. But you can do as you please about this. Correspondence strictly confidential, and all letters sent in plain sealed envelope. Enclose stamp if convenient. Address J. D. HOUSE, Box 348, Albion, Mich.

A Fact Worth Remembering.

There are many such, of course, but here is one which specially commends itself to invalids, viz., that in order to acquire vigor, the basis of health, that invigoration is only possible by re-establishing the functions of digestion and assimilation upon a permanent basis. Stomachics in name are numberless. They impart a slight stimulus to appetite—nothing beyond this. Much more is required, and Hostetter's Stomach Bitters "fills the bill." This time-honored standard invigorant builds up an enfeebled physique and protects it against disease by insuring the thorough conversion of the aliment received into the stomach into blood and bodily tissue. Clothed with increasing strength through this unfailing agency, the system is defended against influences prejudicial to health. Use the Bitters in malaria, rheumatism, kidney and liver trouble and constipation.

Walls of European Cities.

With very few exceptions the old cities of Belgium and Holland have leveled the walls which have played such grand parts in the national history, and they are converted into promenades after the manner of Chester and York. The walls of Antwerp and Malines have been replaced by boulevards. The old bastions of Amsterdam still remain, but the citizens of Arnheim and Utrecht and Hoorn and Zwolle and Haarlem and Leyden disport themselves on fine evenings upon the line of fortifications famous in the most stirring pages of what is perhaps the most stirring of European histories.

Merely an Outline.

The Duc de Choiseul, who was remarkably thin, went to London to negotiate a peace.

"Have they sent the preliminaries of a treaty?" asked one Englishman of another.

"I don't know," was the reply; "but they have sent the outline of an embassador."

IT'S A MILLSTONE

About a young man's neck to be a sufferer from nervous exhaustion, nervous debility, impaired memory, low spirits, irritable temper, and the thousand and one derangements of mind and body that result from, unnatural, pernicious habits, contracted through ignorance. Such habits result in loss of manly power, wreck the constitution and sometimes produce softening of the brain, epilepsy, paralysis, and even dread insanity.

To reach, re-claim and restore such unfortunates to health and happiness, is the aim of the publishers of a book written in plain but chaste language, on the nature, symptoms and curability, by home treatment, of such diseases. This book will be sent sealed, in plain envelope, on receipt of ten cents in stamps, for postage. Address, World's Dispensary Medical Association, 663 Main St., Buffalo, N. Y.

KNOWLEDGE

Brings comfort and improvement and tends to personal enjoyment when rightly used. The many, who live better than others and enjoy life more, with less expenditure, by more promptly adapting the world's best products to the needs of physical being, will attest the value to health of the pure liquid laxative principles embraced in the remedy, Syrup of Figs.

Its excellence is due to its presenting in the form most acceptable and pleasant to the taste, the refreshing and truly beneficial properties of a perfect laxative; effectually cleansing the system, dispelling colds, headaches and fevers and permanently curing constipation. It has given satisfaction to millions and met with the approval of the medical profession, because it acts on the Kidneys, Liver and Bowels without weakening them and it is perfectly free from every objectionable substance.

Syrup of Figs is for sale by all druggists in 50c and $1 bottles, but it is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, whose name is printed on every package, also the name, Syrup of Figs, and being well informed, you will not accept any substitute if offered.

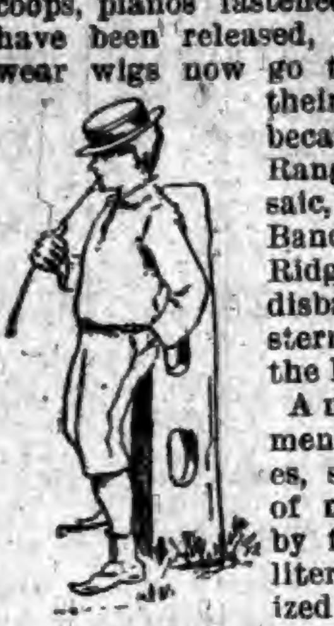
SPANKED THE BANDITS.

A Desperate Organization in New Jersey and How It Was Broken Up.

There is a feeling of deep relief in the town of Park Ridge, N. J. Time locks have been removed from hen coops, pianos fastened to the floors have been released, and those who wear wigs now go to bed without their hats, and all because the "Red Rangers of the Passaic," or the "Boy Bandits of Park Ridge," have been disbanded by the stern authority of the law.

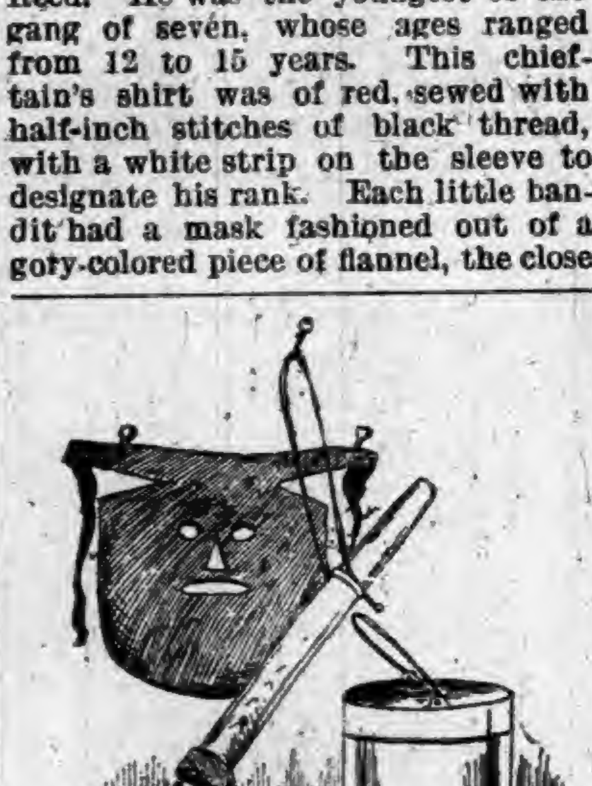


GEORGE REED

A number of young men in knee breeches, stirred to deeds of noble emulation by five-cent library literature, organized a band of bravoes, elected one of their number chieftain, and set out to rob hen roosts and make war generally upon society and property interests. They had a robber camp in the woods, where they gathered to divide their plunder and regale each other over the evening fire with bandit literature. On Sunday they went to Sunday school regularly, and for a long time nobody connected them with the frequent disappearance of various valuables.

The "rangers" all wore flaming red shirts. Where the garments, used by their parents for underwear, were too commodious, they were cut down and roughly sewed up to a Baxter street fit.

Only one of these uniforms fell into the hands of the police, and that was the property of the chieftain of the band, little 12-year-old "Georgie" Reed. He was the youngest of the gang of seven, whose ages ranged from 12 to 15 years. This chieftain's shirt was of red, sewed with half-inch stitches of black thread, with a white strip on the sleeve to designate his rank. Each little bandit had a mask fashioned out of a goty-colored piece of flannel, the close position of the apertures for eyes, nose and mouth indicating the size and age of its wearer. They had billies fashioned from hoehandles, with strips of lead at the bottom, nails for shields for the hands and shoestring cords.



FOUND IN THE RENDEZVOUS.

Finally the organization was discovered, and the parents of the "rangers" put them through a postgraduate course of spanking, and they have now gone out of the bandit business.

How to Play Golf.

For centuries past the game of golf has been the national pastime in Scotland. It is also very popular in England and Canada, and Americans are slowly learning to wield the golf club. Golf grounds are called links, and are open downs, bordered by rough country. Three miles is a popular length for a golf course, although some courses are five miles. They are usually circular, like a race course, so that several games may be played at the same time, one set of players following another with sufficient interval between them so that they will not conflict.

A small gutta-percha ball and from three to seven clubs of different styles are used by each player. These clubs are carried by the player's caddie, or attendant, who also officiates as adviser. The necessary clubs are two wood clubs, the driver and the putter, and one iron club, the cleek or lofter, for work on rough or sandy soil.

The starting point of a golf course is called the teeing ground, and is designated by two marks across the course and at right angles with it. The tee is the slight elevation from which each side strikes its ball at the opening of the game. From nine to eighteen holes, lined with iron and four inches across, are sunk in the course from one hundred to four hundred yards apart. Eighteen holes is the usual number, but nine may be used if the course is a short one. These holes are placed in the center of a level stretch of green about sixty feet square, called the putting green, and the location of each hole is indicated by a flag, which is taken from the hole when the players approach.

In golf singles one person plays against another, in foursomes two persons contest against an equal number of opponents. the partners playing alternately. In golf matches an expert player contests against two or more opponents.

Golfing is begun at the teeing ground, near the first hole, by each side striking the ball toward the second hole. The club alone may be used in moving the ball, and stroke after stroke is played by one side after another until one side puts its ball in the first hole. The player or side that puts the ball in with the least number of strokes wins the hole. If both sides hole their balls with the same number of strokes, each player is credited with half the hole. The players then proceed from hole to hole until the circuit of the course is made, when the side that has won the most holes is declared the winner.

Danger in Grapes.

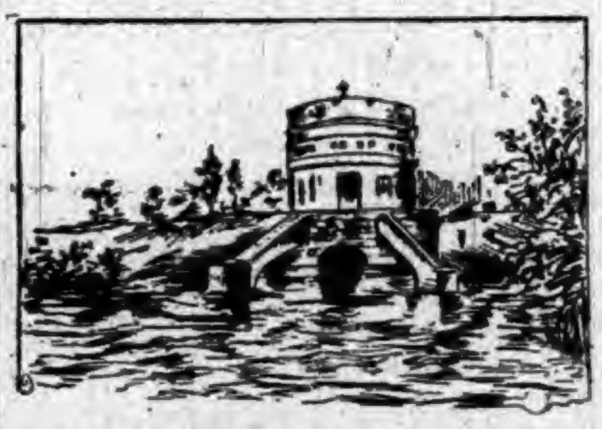
There is probably no more delicious fruit growing than the grape, and certainly none more relished by the majority of people, but like all other pleasurable things of the seductive nature, the grape has its dangers, dangers often quite as fatal as the memorable "grape" of Capt. Bragg, of military fame. People so inordinately fond of the fruit should observe extra caution to never swallow the seeds. While the pulp of the grape is exceedingly nutricious and healthful, and while even the acid in the skins may be beneficial, yet the skins and seeds are totally indigestible. The seeds accummulating in the intestines often find lodgment in a blind sack of the bowel, known to medical men as the veriform appendix, from which only a prompt, skillful and dangerous operation can relieve the sufferer. Every year during the grape season many fatal cases of bowel trouble ocur.

Recently a woman at Grand Rapids had what the physicians believed was cholera. Thorough investigation revealed the fact that her suffering was caused wholly by grape seed. A little wisdom, judgment and proper caution would relieve the burden of objection to this luscious and otherwise healthful fruit. Children and hearty, rapid eaters should be carefully posted regarding this hidden danger.

HIS TOMB ALONE REMAINS.

All that Is Left of the Great Barbarian Ruler, Theodoric.

At the city of Ravenna, Italy, still stands the tomb of Theodoric, surnamed the Great, and founder of the Ostrogothic monarchy, which comprised Italy, Sicily, south-eastern France, Rhæpia, Noricum, Pannonia and Dalmatia. In 488 Theodoric set out with a huge army from Pannonia to carve out a kingdom for himself in Italy. Odoacer was the reigning monarch of Italy, but he could not maintain his own against the hardy and warlike Ostrogoths, and finally he was forced to surrender in the city of Ravenna. Ultimately he was put to death and Theodoric assumed the title of King. Under Theodoric Italy prospered, and the royal court became the center of learning and politeness. Through well-advised alliances Theodoric held in check the barbarians of Western Europe. Though an uneducated barbarian he ruled his subjects justly and promoted agriculture and commerce until Italy became again the leading nation of the world. Toward the end of his reign he persecuted the Catholics for their cruel treatment in the East of the Arians, to which sect he belonged. The greatest blot upon his name was the putting to death of two eminent men—Boethius and Symmachus—whom he falsely believed had conspired against him. Theodoric died at Ravenna in 526, and was buried in a beautiful mausoleum. Subsequently, after the overthrow of Gothic authority in Italy, his ashes were scattered to the four winds of heaven. The mausoleum, however, remains, the sole link that connects us with the greatest of barbarians.



TOMB OF THEODORIC, RAVENNA.

Checkmated.

People who resort to roundabout means to gratify their curiosity sometimes meet with unexpected rebuffs. Mrs. Simmons was possessed of an overwhelming desire to know all about her neighbors' affairs, but she seldom asked a straightforward question. It was her way to say, "Mis' Spencer is jest eat up with wantin' to know" this or that, or "I heard Mis' Hallet remarkin' that she should admire to be told how you managed to do" so and so.

Usually her neighbors gave her the information she wanted, though they were often irritated into calling her a "meddlin', interferin' old piece." When the new minister came to Cyrusville, his young wife was forewarned by the ladies of the parish to be "a leetle close-mouthed with Mis' Simmons, my dear, if you can compass it, fer her tongue is as long as her ears."

"I shall try to," said the little woman, calmly. She succeeded, even though the Simmons house was next to the parsonage, which was certainly a trying circumstance.

For a week or two Mrs. Simmons contented herself with asking slightly impertinent questions in a comparatively direct way, but one day she unfortunately reverted to her timeworn habit. "Mis' Gregg said she'd give a good deal to know what that trimmin' cost on your Sunday dress," she remarked, peering at the minister's wife with her cold little eyes.

"You didn't tell her, did you, Mrs. Simmons?" inquired the lady, pleasantly.

"Why, no!" gasped old lady Simmons, quite taken off her guard by this unexpected rejoinder.

"Thank you," said the little minister's wife, sweetly. "I felt confident you would know that I shouldn't care to have everything of that sort discussed in the parish."

And between this tribute to her discretion and a confused feeling that evidently the minister's wife credited her with secret sources of information, old lady Simmons' mouth was closed, and her mind employed in speculation for the rest of that afternoon.

The senior surviving officer of the confederacy is James Longstreet, for whom a New York firm is now publishing a book. Beauregard was the last of the full generals, Longstreet heading the list of lieutenant generals. He is a very old man now, gray and deaf. He lives quietly and simply at his home in Gainesville, Ga. General U. S. Grant and Longstreet were army friends before '61. Longstreet accepted office from Grant when the latter was President, and has since taken no part whatever even in local politics.

But He's the Devil Always.

According to the Talmudists, Satan, whose real name is Sammael, or Eblis, was originally an angel with six wings. He is also known as the Old Serpent, the Devil, Beelzebub, the Unclean Spirit, Leviathan and Asael.

There are some women who know how to cook mashed potatoes so well that they never cook potatoes any other way.—Atchison Globe.

A Warning.

Everybody, or at any rate almost everybody, has been saying that the diabolical practice would lead to mischief, and now it has. You can't throw rice, shoes, and other groceries and habiliments at young married persons, year after year, without doing damage. In East New York, which is really a part of Brooklyn, a wedding took place the other night. The husband and the wife came down the stairs amid the customary shower, and bolted for the carriage. At this moment the bridegroom's brother rushed into the street, pulled a big revolver, and fired it cheerfully but recklessly in every direction. "Some of the wedding guests," says the chronicler, "had an enjoyable time dodging flying lead." Among those to whom the wedding guest afforded amusement and exercise was a policeman, who, as soon as the revolver was emptied, arrested the convivial gentleman and put him in jail. It is thus plain to be seen that rice-throwing leads to the most deplorable consequences.—Buffalo Courier.

Storing Implements.

The sheltering of farm implements is not the only thing required to keep them in good repair, but they must be put away in good condition. For example, a plow stored coated with mud will rust and rot though under a tight roof, and such a coating is much more harmful to delicate machinery. Bright steel surfaces may be clean and yet rust unless protected by a coat of coal oil or beef tallow. The tallow must be applied warm, as a liquid. Brown mineral paint is very cheap, is easily mixed with boiled linseed oil, and applied to the old wooden parts of the machines, where the paint has worn off, will prevent decay. Have two brushes, one flat and wide for large surfaces, the other small and round for covering narrow surfaces and getting into corners. Always put the edged tools away sharp, and have all necessary repairs on the machinery done this fall, so all will be in readiness to begin work at the first opportunity.—Farm, Stock, and Home.

A Family Laxative.

Physicians are not inclined to recommend self-medication to the laity. Yet there is one need, says the American Analyst, which they are almost unable to supply. We refer to the "family laxative." The family physician is able to prescribe for the most complicated and obscure of maladies and yet is often puzzled to know just what to give when asked for a remedy which can be kept in the house for family use as a laxative, that shall be effective, free from danger, and not unpleasant to take. When absent on our summer vacation we were asked by four different parties, representing as many families, what we thought of the "Syrup of Figs." Not one word did we volunteer on the subject, and we were somewhat surprised to find that there was this small token of the very general use of that preparation. These parties said they derived more benefit from it and found it more pleasant to take than anything of the kind they had ever used. The simple question with them was, is it a dangerous compound? We informed them that its active ingredient was a preparation of senna, and that it was entirely free from danger. With this assurance they volunteered the information that they should continue to keep it in the house.

The therapeutical properties of senna are so well known that comment on this seems unnecessary. It might be well to notice, however, that Bartholow says it is "a very safe and serviceable cathartic," and that it is "highly prized as a remedy for constipation." He also makes the important observation that its use "is not followed by intestinal torpor and constipation."

The simple truth of the matter is, we have altogether too few preparations which we can recommend to our families as effective laxatives. But the California Fig Syrup Company has one of the most desirable combinations for this purpose with which we are familiar. The Fig Syrup Company gives to the profession the composition of this preparation, therefore there is no secret about it; the persons who use this laxative speak in the highest terms about it; and we are pleased to notice that a large number of physicians are prescr bing it.

Viewed from the narrowest and most selfish standpoint the physician will lose nothing by recommending such a preparation as Syrup of Figs to his patients; while viewed from the highest standpoint of doing the best possible by those who place themselves in our care, we would say the profession cannot do better than give their indorsement to such a preparation.

His Choice.

"That's a commendable ambition. Why would you like to be a brick-layer?"

Accomplishments of a Montana Girl.

Paul Van Cleve, a member of the Montana Legislature, owns a big sheep ranch in that State. His daughter Helen, aged 14 years, is his constant companion in his rides about the ranch and is reputed to be one of the most accomplished riders in that part of the country. She is a picturesque figure on horseback, as she dresses somewhat after the cowboy style, wearing trousers, colored shirt, and broad sombrero, and rides in the true cowboy fashion, often bareback. She is also a good shot with the rifle. Although living in an isolated spot, Mr. Van Cleve has had his children carefully educated and his home is one of refinement, being in fact, a favorite social gathering place for ranch-owners for miles around.—Illinois State Register.

A Difference of Opinion.

The worthy Sunday-school superintendent was illustrating the text, "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."

Superintendent—If I want to raise a crop of turnips, what sort of seeds do I sow, children?

Children—Turnip seed.

Superintendent—If I want to raise a crop of tomatoes, what kind of seed must I sow?

Children—Tomato seed.

Superintendent—Very good. Now, if you want to raise a crop of good manhood, what kind of seed must you sow?"

And an observer who kept tally reported that the school on test vote was a tie between turnip seed and tomato seed.—Buffalo Times.

What Women Ought to Resemble.

A philosopher says: "There are three things which a good woman ought to resemble in one particular, but not in another. Thus, she ought to be like the snail, which always keeps in the house, but she should not copy its example in putting all she possesses on her back. She should resemble the echo, which never speaks unless spoken to, but she ought not, like the echo, always try to have the last word. Lastly, she ought to be true and correct as the town clock, but she ought not, like the clock, to make noise enough to be heard all over the town."

Decline of Agriculture in England.

It would appear from the third volume of the census of England and Wales, that the total number of both sexes employed on the land, which in 1871 was 1,153.544, and in 1881, 1,071,941, was in 1891, 980,278, showing a total decrease of 173,271 for the twenty years, in spite of the general increase of the population. Part of this decrease is due to the diminished employment of women and boys, which is probably pure goods; but the total figures certainly confirm the impression that the people are receding from agriculture.—London Spectator.

Both Appropriate.

A hotel in Switzerland bore on one of its walls the time-honored inscription: "Haspes salve!" (Welcome stranger!) After rebuilding, the legend had to be restored; but the painter who must have had some experience as a traveler, made a very slight alteration in one of the words, and caused it to read: "Haspes solve!" (Pay, Stranger!)

Why Cows Give Down Milk.

To make a cow milk easily she should be kept as contented as possible. If worried, there is sure to be some tension of the muscle which retains the milk, and this holds it up. Usually a feed that the cow likes will remove the worry, and the holding up muscle will be relaxed. It has often had this effect upon cows that were worrying about the removal of their calves. A cow's maternal affection is active, but her memory is not so strong as to make her think of her calf while she is eating.

If the milker is careful, it is quite possible that the cow may for the time think her calf is sucking, and so give her milk more readily than she otherwise would. We have seen cows that after milking was over would look around and show their disappointment plainly in not seeing their calves, as they evidently expected.—American Cultivator.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

The Greatest Medical Discovery of the Age.

KENNEDY'S MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

DONALD KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, MASS.,

Has discovered in one of our common pasture weeds a remedy that cures every kind of Humor, from the worst Scrofula down to a common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder humor). He has now in his possession over two hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

When the lungs are affected it causes shooting pains, like needles passing through them; the same with the Liver or Bowels. This is caused by the ducts being stopped, and always disappears in a week after taking it.

If the stomach is foul or bilious it will cause squeamish feelings at first.

No change of diet ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it. Dose, one tablespoonful in water at bedtime. Read the Label. Send for Book.

Here's the idea

The bow has a groove on each end. A collar runs down inside the pendant (stem) and fits into the grooves, firmly locking the bow to the pendant, so that it cannot be pulled or twisted off.

they would have realized more than their property was worth, and the town of Auburn would have soon borne a different aspect.

But there were a few who would not sell unless for a ransom, and the years passing, they have lived to regret a lost opportunity. For years, vacant lots on which stood dilapidated houses surrounded by fruit trees or devoid of vegetation, located upon our principal streets, were interspersed among well improved properties and lingered long to illustrate backward tendencies in the most progressive communities.

Some owners of farm land contiguous to the corporation refused extravagant offers and would-be manufacturers were driven to seek sites for plants elsewhere,

The tide in the affairs of Auburn had come, but in some vital points it was not taken at its flood and it lost much that would in turn have secured more and

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

A writer said of Auburn during the summer of 1874: "Few towns in the west have shown during the past three years so rapid a growth upon such a healthy and substantial basis, Blocks, residences and manufactories speak of her prosperity in no uncertain terms. Thrift and enterprise prevail and church privileges and educational facilities attract the most desirable class of population. The beautiful site and healthy atmosphere alike recommend the place as a home, not only for merchants, manufacturers, business and professional men, but for those who might wish to retire from the cares of an active life."

He spoke truthfully. Business was large for an inland town, a business not speculative but based upon popular demand, supported by home-made capital, the fruit of care and toil, of economy and forethought. The townspeople were loyal to their leaders and proud of their newly acquired interests. They saw, with pleasure, freights increasing and passenger traffic picking up on the Eel River road and thought of this last as of one in which each had a personal interest. And not Auburn alone, but our sister town of Butler felt the healthy stimulus of the new railroad which brought fresh life and activity in its trains.

Long had Butler but escaped its ups and downs; long had her citizens, like those of Auburn, watched and waited and worked for the promised day, and now it had come and the town grew out of its long known embarassments to take its stand to the front in its now favorable prospects and its evident ability to meet in full the exacting demands of a cautious and conservative public.

With spring, the work of constructing the Baltimore & Ohio extension was resumed and prosecuted with unwonted vigor. Along in April, full sixty-two carloads of material, ties and rails were transported over the Eel River line to Auburn Junction. Enough track had been laid to admit of cars being run thereon and track laying eastward commenced, while a strong force of bridge builders just west were also busy at work.

A village in Concord township was laid out just west of the point where the railroad crossed the Saint Joe River, and the attention attracted thither augured well for the success of the enterprising proprietors, John and Jacob D. Leighty. Among the first improvements was a hotel erected by William Leighty. Store buildings followed and this speedily became an important shipping point.

In 1879, J. D. Leighty put up the first brick building, since which time, many others have been erected, churches have been built and a fine school house upon well-chosen grounds provides for the school going population. Steadily the village has increased and expanded till the inhabitants deemed themselves of sufficient numbers and importance to warrant their incorporation as the Town of St. Joe, but thus far they have failed in their application through too extended an area to the proposed corporation. Farmers object to being made unwilling townspeople.

Mr. Haveland, the contractor for building eight miles of railroad had the grading done during May; and track laying began at the Junction where iron had been accumulated, and from there eastward, was busily carried on. The Sheets bridge over Cedar Creek had been finished by the last of April and a heavy force was engaged on bridges all along the route.

By the last of May, the railroad had been completed from the Junction east to the river and Jacob Stamets had platted grond south of Auburn, north of the track and was prepared to let the contract for the erection of a hotel convenient to the depot for accommodation of travelers. All was going well and auspicious for a South Auburn of no small extent. The railroad company put up a water tank and an elevator eastward of the highway leading to Fort Wayne and had built a depot westward of the same road.

These concessions to Auburn at Sheets Crossing presaged a crisis in the history of the town. The Eel River Company made a proposition to locate shops at this place and the Baltimore & Ohio Company negotiated to acquire land at the site of their elevator and depot.

Unfortunately for us, both projects failed, as other considerations entered into the question and carried these improvements elsewhere. It was understood that Messrs. Sheets and Stamets had offered the B. & O. company five acres for shop sites. The former placed his land at a high price, the latter gentleman cheerfully offered his two acres as a donation and, in full faith of its acceptance went on with the work of building his hotel, which stood solitary and vacant like a Kansas High School building in a boom-killed town, till some chance of retrieving a part of the loss was presented at Auburn Junction, whither it was removed and now does serviceable duty as the Hotel Brunswick.

Vice President Keyser wished Auburn to grade and tie a side track at the crossing, but in view of the road's location so far south after our people had given $1,000 for a survey that would have brought the line within the southern limits of the town, this was refused. Meanwhile work went vigorously forward and on August 6th the last mile of rails between Auburn and Defiance was laid in four hours. Hon. A. P. Edgerton, of Hicksville, Ohio, was called upon to drive the last spike, which he "hit five times out of eight strikes." The first train passed over the new line on the same day.

Whatever of improvements the Eel River Company had designed for Auburn were decided for Butler and our loss was her gain. A round house and other buildings were begun and, until the summer of 1893 when the town of Ashley was founded on the new line of railroad on the north boundary of the county, the interest of the Wabash people at Butler constituted no inconsiderable portion of the town's prosperity.

As Auburn made shift to get along independent of railroad concessions and knows nothing by experience of the strikes and discharges incident to a railroad town and its vicissitudes to workmen and the business community, arising out of inability to meet their obligations, so Butler quickly accommodated herself to the acknowledged loss by encouraging with satisfactory results the establishment of basket and bicycle factories and insuring her new population cheap and permanent homes.

Meanwhile, interest in the B. & O. & C. railroad shifted to the Junction where it was proposed that Auburn should acquire and donate forty acres of land for a site for railroad shops. It was understood that this condition had been accepted and steps taken to acquire the land, when what has since been known as "The Baltimore Land and Improvement Company" was organized with a purpose to select their own site for an independent town, whose lots should be laid out in blocks, whose streets should be graded and opportunity given employes to obtain homes through a series of partial payments on improved property.

In November, 1874, following several strategical purchases, including the Pearce farm just west of the Junction, the company, which was practically the railroad corporation, finally bought the Rogers and other lands situated three miles west of the Junction at what was then called "the swamp."

A large force was concentrated thither to put in a "Y" and several side tracks. A month later it became widely advertised that a town site was to be platted there to which was given the name of Garrett City, and it was rumored that extensive shops were to be built there as a division terminus. Scenting possible speculative chances, many strangers came west to look over the ground, but the company had the matter well in hand.

Trains stopped at "Garrett City" for refreshments, but the city was yet to be and the view to the visitor was wild and discouraging. Several cars had been placed alongside the track and served for a dining hall until one could be constructed.

In time the depot, tank and elevator were removed from Sheets' Crossing and whatever chances Auburn might have had to become a railroad city were dissolved in the wonderful and mirage-like rise and growth of what in 1893 has become the most populous place in DeKalb county and has taken advanced ground as a city in fact.

The railroads were now realities. Their construction had promised much for Auburn and her advantages from them have been weighty and permanent. They furnished easy and speedy communication to all parts of the county and the country. They presented a choice of routes and they placed the business man, the manufacturer and the farmer in touch with other towns and gave the latter a choice of markets.

The three lines intersected a mile southwest of Auburn, at which point a flourishing village has grown up and to which from the south end of VanBuren street a fine avenue extends which will ere long be built all along its extent and unite the suburb to the corporation, as was the intention of those who laid it out.

The rapid growth of what is known as "Gastown," eastward of Cedar Creek, has this season been only equaled by that to the southwest in Sprott's Addition, and the Junction, an unpromising swampy tract in 1874, now bids fair to soon become a village of considerable importance from its factories and convenience in shipping products.

A very important consequence of railroad construction apart from transportation has been its bearing upon the subject of taxation.

The extent to which those corporations contribute to the local and state treasuries is not generally known and the information drawn from the Auditor's duplicates must come in the nature of a pleasant surprise and serve to greatly modify the antagonism felt by many toward them.

The semi annual payment of drafts for thousands of dollars of the railroad taxes has long brought direct and powerful aid to our local government to enable them to meet current obligations.

The Lake Shore formerly paid for the year in the spring, but of late the high rate of valuation has seemed to the railroad excessive and they have not only not paid in in full at once, but have paid a part under protest and suffered the rest to go delinquent pending a decision upon the constitutionality of the assessment.

This assessment increased the taxable property of DeKalb county to such an extent that the annual railroad taxes paid into the treasury of this county for the year 1892 was not far from THIRTY THOUSAND DOLLARS.

On the Road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem.

Stopping only two days in Jerusalem, we went on to Bethlehem on the twenty-first of December, for we wished to avoid the throngs of pilgrims who crowd the road on the last days before Christmas. We followed the very road over which the Magi came bearing their costly gifts to worship the new-born king, and passed the "Well of the Magi," where, as they tarried, the star which they had seen in the East, shone again before them and guided them to the lowly stable in Bethlehem. In the depths of the well, so runs the legend, the star of the Magi can be seen by broad daylight. A very inopportune cloud floated over the sky just when I was trying to see it; but Agnes, who would not take trouble to dismount, most provokingly said that it was a very convenient cloud.

Though the distance is but six miles, no hundred other miles in the circuit of the globe contain so much of interest in legend and miracle. It was a borderland between the seen and unseen world, and angels, according to popular belief, have stood on most of the hilltops and in the fields.

You pass the field where grew the lentils for which Esau sold his heritage; but not satified with one story another has been added to it, which has given it the name of "The field of the niggardly peas." According to the legend, our Savior passed the field one day when hungry, and asked the farmer, who was sowing peas, for a handful of them. The man, who had a heart of stone, replied, "I am sowing pebbles." "Ah, well," said Jesus, "then shalt thou reap pebbles." When the harvest came, pebbles only were found; and in spite of the numbers which the passing pilgrims carry away every year, 'tis a field of pebbles to this day. They are small and round, not unlike peas.—From "Christmas Eve at Bethlehem," in Demorest's Family Magazine for December.

The Great Through Car Line.

It is a well established fact that the North-Western Line (Chicago and North-Western R'y) in its equipment and train service, its general facilities for the accomodation of all classes of travel, and its methods of looking after the comfort and welfare of its patrons, takes rank with the leading railways of the world.

Its through car lines extend from Chicago to St. Paul and Minneapolis, the "Twin Cities of the Northwest;" to Duluth, the Superiors, Ashland, Marquette, and the wonderful iron and copper regions of northern Wisconsin and Michigan; to Winona, Pierre, and the rich agricultural sections of Minnesota and the Dakotas; to Des Moines, Sioux City, Council Bluffs, Omaha, Lincoln, the prosperous and growing cities of Iowa and Nebraska; to Deadwood, the Dakotas to Hot Springs, and the famous mining districts of the Black Hills; to Denver, Salt Lake and the health resorts of Colorado and Utah; to San Francisco, Cal.; Portland, Oregon, and Pacific Coast and Puget Sound points.

The perfectly equipped vestibuled trains of the North-Western Line convey the traveler comfortably, safely and quickly to nearly every part of the West and Northwest, and while one may travel surrounded by all the luxuries afforded by an equipment of magnificent sleeping cars, buffet, smoking and library cars, compartment sleeping cars, and superb dining cars, the comfort and convenience of passengers desiring to travel at small expense is promoted by the provision of accomodations for their use in Tourist Sleeping cars, Free Reclining Chair cars and commodious day coaches.

In a word, if you contemplate a trip to almost any portion of the West and Northwest, your ticket should read via the North-Western Line. Maps, time tables and general information can be obtained of ticket agents in the United States and Canada, or by addressing W. A. Thrall, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, Chicago & North Western R'y, Chicago, Ill. 51

A RETIRED BUSINESS WOMAN.

A Page From Her History.

The important experiences of others are interesting. The following is no exception: "I had been troubled with heart disease 25 years, much of that time very seriously. For five years I was treated by one physician continuously. I was in business, but obliged to retire on account of my health. A physician told my friends that I could not live a month. My feet and limbs were badly swollen, and I was indeed in a serious condition when a gentleman directed my attention to Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure, and said that his sister, who had been afflicted with heart disease, had been cured by the remedy, and was again a strong, healthy woman. I purchased a bottle of the Heart Cure, and in less than an hour after taking the first dose I could feel a decided improvement in the circulation of my blood. When I had taken three doses I could move my ankles, something I had not done for months, and my limbs had been swollen so long that they seemed almost putrified. Before I had taken one bottle of the New Heart Cure the swelling had all gone down, and I was so much better that I did my own work. On my recommendation six others are taking this valuable remedy."—Mrs. Morgan, 569 W. Harrison St., Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Miles' New Heart Cure, a discovery of an eminent specialist in heart disease, is sold by all druggists on a positive guarantee, or sent by the Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind., on receipt of price, $1 per bottle, six bottles for $5, express prepaid. It is positively free from all opiates or dangerous drugs.

Mr. and Mrs. George Huber have gone to visit relatives in Jefferson county, Tenn., and perhaps other places. Their program also includes an attendance at the wedding of a nephew of Mrs. H. It is expected that they will return in about three months.

Activity among the movers seems to have commenced unusually early, or has lasted very late. Many families are now changing their abode, and many are moving in from other towns. Mrs. Jonathan Spencer has advertised her household goods for sale at auction. She intends going west, to live with her daughter, Mrs. Adam Shull. There is something more or less sad about old persons disposing of, and scattering their possessions, endeared to them by long usage; and to leave what has been known to them as "home" during the best years of life—the place where sorrow has shown its presence and much happiness has been allotted—it is but little unlike severing the very heart-strings to give up the old home.

One portion of the people—
  A mighty multitude,
Care nothing for Hawaii,
  From any standpoint viewed.
The tariff don't disturb them,
  Nor do the silver laws—
They're chiefly interested
  Just now in Santa Claus.

Harvey L. Kester died at his residence in the west part of town, Thursday of typhoid fever after an illness of about six week. Mr. Kester came to Garrett in 1891 and was liked by all who had the honor of his acquaintance. The remains were taken to North Manchester, Ind., Saturday for interment. A delegation from the C. N. He has been in America but twenty-two months, but in that time has learned to speak the English language quite well His mission here is to learn the methods of the christian people so that he can instruct his brethren in the true light of the Bible.

Farmers' Institutes.

These institutes were held in nearly every county, last year, being in 89 of the 92. This year it is believed they will be held in every county. The one for this county, will be held at St. Joe, Wednesday and Thursday, January 17 and 18, R. M. Lockhart, of Waterloo, being the president; the chief speakers being Mr. Mount and Mr. Terry. Our local farmer lecturers are in great demand, J. N. Latta, of Noble county, being assigned to lecture in not less than nine different county institutes, and Cal Husselman, of DeKalb county, being also given nine counties. His appointments are, Sunman, in Ripley county; North Vernon, in Jennings county; Lexington, in Scott county; Browntown, in Jackson county; Rushville, in Rush county; Connersville, in Fayette county; Brookville, in Franklin county. Both gentlemen have two days' work in several of these places. We are told that northern Indiana, is about at the head, in the way of real farmer lecturers—men who are real farmers, and yet have the abilily to go forth and assist in these institutes. Mr. Husselman, as reported in the latest circular from Purdue, has six lectures on swine. They are: "The natural history of swine. A swine farm; location and natural advantages. How to make a beginning Care and management. Diseases and their prevention and treatment. How to feed and market for profit." Since writing the above, we have received a letter from Hon. R. M. Lockhart, calling our attention and the attention of our readers to this meeting. He speaks highly of the two gentlemen who are to assist at the St. Joe meeting, Hon. James A. Mount, of Montgomery county, this state, and Mr. T. B. Terry, of Hudson, Ohio. Both are practical farmers. It is also expected that two or three other speakers will be present and assist.

The Great Through Car Line.

It is a well established fact that the North-Western Line (Chicago and North-Western R'y) in its equipment and train service, its general facilities for the accomodation of all classes of travel, and its methods of looking after the comfort and welfare of its patrons takes rank with the leading railways of the world.

Its through car lines extend from Chicago to St. Paul and Minneapolis, the "Twin Cities of the Northwest;" to Duluth, the Superiors, Ashland, Marquette, and the wonderful iron and copper regions of northern Wisconsin and Michigan; to Winona, Pierre, and the rich agricultural sections of Minnesota and the Dakotas; to Des Moines, Sioux City, Council Bluffs, Omaha, Lincoln, the prosperous and growing cities of Iowa and Nebraska; to Deadwood, the Dakota Hot Springs, and the famous mining districts of the Black Hills; to Denver, Salt Lake and the health resorts of Colorado and Utah; to San Francisco, Cal.; Portland, Oregon, and Pacific Coast and Puget Sound points.

The perfectly equipped vestibuled trains of the North-Western Line convey the traveler comfortably, safely and quickly to nearly every part of the West and Northwest, and while one may travel surrounded by all the luxuries afforded by an equipment of magnificent sleeping cars, buffet, smoking and library cars, compartment sleeping cars, and superb dining cars, the comfort and convenience of passengers desiring to travel at small expense is promoted by the provision of accomodations for their use in Tourist Sleeping cars, Free Reclining Chair cars and commodious day coaches.

In a word, if you contemplate a trip to almost any portion of the West and Northwest, your ticket should read via the North-Western Line. Maps, time tables and general information can be obtained of ticket agents in the United States and Canada, or by addressing W. A. Thrall, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, Chicago & North Western R'y, Chicago, Ill. 51

EVENTS OF INTEREST.

THAT OCCURRED DURING THE PAST WEEK.

Attempt to Kidnap a Little Child for Ransom—Kidnaper Killed—The Western Base Ball League Organized—Resort to Dynamite.

The Western Base Ball League.

A new western base ball league was formally organized at the Grand Hotel, in Indianapolis. The following cities, which will comprise the league, were represented by the following gentlemen: George Ellis, Grand Rapids; H. H. Drake and T. H. Boyer, Sioux City; J. E. Barnes, Minneapolis; C. Hussman and M. R. Killilen, Milwaukee, J. E. Manning, Kansas City; D. A. Long, Toledo, and John T. Brush and Wm. Sharsig, Indianapolis. Mr. Barnes also held Detroit's proxy. One of the proposed schemes is that each club will be required to deposit $1,000 as a guarantee of good faith that the club will continue its membership throughout the season.

Robbing Graves.

The graves in the cemetery at Onawa, Ill., are being robbed and the bodies shipped away, presumably to some medical college. One of the graves robbed is that of Thomas Davis, an old man who died of a disease that baffled medical skill. Several graves have been opened lately by the authorities when the first discovery of missing remains was made. Suspicion points to some of the prominent citizens of the town as being connected with the outrage. The County Attorney will present the matter to the next Grand Jury.

Kidnapers Frustrated.

Joseph H. Kraft, a merchant of New Albany, Ind., was sent for the other night by his wife, who informed him that she had discovered a scheme to kidnap their only child for ransom. Mr. Kraft and friends hid and when Stephen Whiteman, Charles Compton, Mason White, and another appeared in obedience to a certain signal to capture the girl, Kraft fired and killed Stephen Whiteman, who gave his pals away. The others were arrested and jailed. Mob violence is expected.

Aid for Starving Miners.

Madison (Wis.) special: Gov. Peck has decided upon issuing an appeal to the people of Wisconsin to donate supplies for the destitute Gogebic range miners and their families, and he is only waiting until the necessary arrangements can be made at Hurley and other cities on the range for the proper distribution of the supplies. It is believed the Governor will issue the appeal soon, and it is certain to meet with a prompt response.

Bland Will Try Again.

Chairman Bland of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is preparing a bill, which he will introduce at the opening of the next session, in effect re-enacting the law of January 18, 1837. This law provided for the silver dollars of 412½ grains, and declared that "the dollars, half-dollars, quarter-dollars, dimes, and half-dimes shall be legal tenders according to their nominal values for any sums whatever."

Lumber Burned.

Big Rapids (Mich.) special: A furious fire, and one that in loss of property has seldom had its parallel in the north woods, broke out at Keno, Newaygo County, the other night, and was not extinguished until $200,000 worth of lumber, the property of William Peters of Toledo, had been destroyed. There was only $47,000 of insurance. The fire is thought to have been of incendiary origin.

Resort to Dynamite.

Another dynamite explosion occurred at Marion, Ind., by which the dwelling occupied by Deputy Prosecutor Parker was shattered and the people awakened from their slumbers, but no one was hurt. This is supposed to be another episode in the war between the saloon and the anti-saloon elements.

Convicts Released.

Secretary Carlisle has ordered the release of the ten Russian convicts picked up at sea and landed at San Francisco. It is understood that the Russian Minister will endeavor to have them re-arrested and extradited.

A Kick from Mexico.

The Mexican Minister has complained to Secretary of State Gresham that the Texans do not try to prevent the violation of the neutrality laws.

Assassinated.

George Rausch, a respectable citizen of Meredosia, Ill., was murdered by an unknown assassin, who shot him with a revolver.

Work Resumed at Joliet.

The Illinois Steel Company at Joliet, has began work again with a force of 900 men, and will increase their force as the times warrant. The plant has been closed down eleven months.

Ended in a Row.

The Border War.

Eeming (N. M.) special: Couriers just up from the scene of the Mexican revolution report that the rebels have entered the Mormon colonies of Diez, Chihuahua, and Pacheco and have taken horses, arms, and supplies, but have offered no bodily harm to the colonists. The rebels are now encamped in the foot-hills of the Sierra Madres, waiting the approach of the Mexican troops. The refugees who have crossed into the United States for protection, report that the rebels number about three hundred. Persons falling into the hands of the rebels were robbed of arms and horses and allowed to go on, with the promise to get out of the country. The revolutionists are being led by Sanita and Perrez.

El Paso (Texas) special: The Mexican council here has invoked the aid of the State District officers in assisting to quell the Palomas revolutionists and has notified the District Judge that men are at work in the Texas towns, below here, of Ysleta, Socorro, and Sierra Blanca, gathering men and arms for a Mexican outbread. Two troops of Mexican cavalry from Chihuahua County arrived at San Jose to quell the outbreak.

ANOTHER HORROR.

A Passenger Train Jumps the Track and Tumbles Down an Embankment.

Birmingham (Ala.) special: At Lafayette, Ala., while the passenger train from Opelika, on the East Alabama Railroad, was entering the town, running fifteen miles an hour, the entire train except the engine jumped the track on a curve and rolled down a ten-foot embankment. The train was filled with passengers, and immediately after the accident the wreck took fire from the overturned stoves. A panic followed among the terror stricken passengers.

Thomas Driver, of Lafayette, who was riding in the smoking car, was caught under the seat, and before he could be rescued was burned to a crisp. All the others were gotten out.

The injured are:

Judge J. R. Dowdell of Lafayette, arm and jaw broken and internally injured; will die.

W. J. Mitchell of Five Points, Ala., severe cut over the eye.

E. J. Mitchell of Five Points, Ala., fractured skull; will die.

Mrs. Roberts and little child of California, shoulder broken.

J. H. Lowe of St. Cloud, Ga., one eye knocked out.

W. C. Hunter of Chambers County, Ala., seriously hurt internally.

R. F. Weathers of Roanoke, Va., seriously injured.

Jessie Osborne arm broken.

The condition of Judge Dowdell and E. J. Mitchell is critical.

The cause of the derailment is not known. The smoker and one coach were burned when the fire was extinguished. Driver's death was a terrible one. He burned up before the eyes of the other passengers who were powerless to save him.

LIT UP LONDON.

London special: Fire started in W. S. Thompson & Co.'s Corset Factory, 48 and 49 Old Bailey, E. C. It spread rapidly to the shop of the Crown Perfumery Company at 49, and thence to Lockharts, Blackie & Co.'s publishing offices. Before the firemen could get well to work several other buildings had caught fire and the rear of Cassell's publishing house was in flames. Shortly after 11 o'clock a third of the frontage between Fleet street and Prujeau Square crashed down to the pavement. The firemen ran for their lives. Several barely escaped burial in the burning wreck. A column of flame shot up 200 feet, illuminating the city and throwing into lurid relief the dome of St. Paul's and the spires of many churches. Enormous crowds gathered in Newgate street and Ludgate Hill. Twenty fire engines were kept at work throwing water on the buildings near the tottering walls. The Old Bailey sessions house and Newgate Prison were drenched with innumerable streams of water to keep them from taking fire. Several times the report that the prison had caught was started, but every time it proved to be false. The loss will amount to many thousands of pounds. The Cassell & Blackies, publishers, suffered considerable damage but the bulk of their machinery and stock was not injured.

A WILD HAND-CAR

Dashes Over a 300-Foot Bank with Seven Men.

Hazeltown (Penn.) special: The Beaver Meadow branch of the Lehigh Valley Railroad was the scene of a thrilling accident, in which seven men narrowly escaped death. It was about noon when Track Foreman Eck, with six Hungarian laborers, boarded a hand-car at Beaver Meadow, intending to reach Hazel Creek before the express would leave there. The road is marked by a two-per cent. grade, with heavy curves skirting many deep ravines. They were going at a lively rate of speed about half way down, when the brake chain broke.

The men immediately lost control of the truck and like a flash it rushed down the mountain side. Afraid to jump, and realizing their danger, the men cried loudly for assistance. Many persons along the road watched them in helpless horror. Just as the curve above Hazelbrook was reached, and on the edge of a high embankment, snap went the forward wheel and in an instant the truck, with its freight, was precipitated to the bottom of the bank, 300 feet below. Andrew Koenitz was taken from the wreck dead. Mike Mority was fatally injured. Foreman Eck sustained severe contusions on the body and head. Joe Taurenz had his legs broken and head cut. The other three men escaped with severe, but not dangerous injuries.

MANY LIVES LOST

By the Gale, Which Continues with Great Severity in England.

Liverpool special: The gale continues unabated, and the reports which are arriving here, after many hours' delay owing to the break-down of the telegraph wires, indicates that an immense amount of damage has been done to shipping throughout the country. At Sunderland several houses have been partially wrecked, and one building collapsed, killing a woman. The chimney of a paper mill near Kendall fell during the storm, killing three people. The steamer Union was wrecked near Dundee, and four of her crew were drowned. In addition there were many minor shipping casualties. At Huddersfield a chimney fell, killing two people. A large steamer foundered near the rocky headland called Garron, at Sand End, near Banff. The shore is strewn with wreckage, and it is learned that the crew, numbering about twenty-five hands, were lost with the vessel.

MELLO CRIPPLED.

Naval Representatives at Rio Take Action in Matters.

A cipher dispatch, received at the Navy Department from Rio De Janeiro, signed by the commander of the United States naval forces at Rio, says: The naval representatives of eight nations, including ours, decided not to permit munitions of war to be landed at Rio. Santos still being in possession of the Brazilian Government and connected with Rio by railway, munitions of war for Rio can be landed at Santos.

Secretary Herbert says: "It looks to me that this means Mello is being very much crippled. The object of the naval representatives in making this declaration is for the protection of commerce. They do not recognize Mello as a belligerent, and object, in the interests of commerce, to firing by either side. As long as commerce is carried on, I do not see what he can do unless he gets help from the shore or is able to organize an army."

War in Earnest.

Deming (N. M.) special: News has just reached here of a serious revolution on the Mexican border, thirty miles to the south. Last week Mexican revolutionists to the number of 100 attacked the town of Las Polomas and ransacked the customs house. After the raid the rebels fled to the mountains and were supposed to have gone south into the State of Chihuahua. The other day they again entered Las Polomas, driving the inhabitants and custom house employes across the line into the American town of Columbus. They then took possession of the town. The roads and passes leading to Polomas south to Ascension, a distance of over 100 miles, are in the hands of the revolutionists and all communication with the interior cut off, no one being permitted to pass.

Several Americans and Mexican citizens have been captured, but have thus far been released upon surrender of their horses and ammunition.

A Fugitive Surrenders.

An arrest was made by the City Marshal of Algona, Iowa, which may lead to the arrest of all the parties implicated in the Kessler, Ind., Lake Shore train robbery. A well-dressed man about 30 years of age, voluntarily gave himself up to the Marshal and told him that he was implicated in this robbery, and being tired of wandering around as a fugitive decided upon this step. He says that if proper clemency is extended he will divulge the whole story. The man evidently knows what he is talking about, and those who heard him relate his story give credence to it. The general manager of the Lake Shore has been notified of the arrest.

Collision of Trains.

Two Cleveland, Canton and Southern and Lake Erie, Alliance and Southern Railway passenger trains collided at a crossing at Minerva, Ohio.

Roadmaster Randolph was badly hurt about the head.

Milton Skelly was injured internally.

Jacob Moulder was badly cut and bruised.

James Leisure was badly bruised.

Both train crews claim the target was set to give them the right of way.

Lehigh Valley Railroad Strike.

Philadelphia special: The employes of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company struck at 10 o'clock Sunday night. The strike is said to involve more than 95 per cent. of the employes, including firemen, trainmen, and telegraph operators.

At Wilkesbarre, Penn., the Lehigh Valley strikers are now parading the streets, headed by brass bands. They carry banners with inscriptions: "Give Us Justice;" "We are Not Slaves." The Sheriff has been notified to be in readiness.

Strike Settled by Arbitration.

Terre Haute special: The Minshall miners, about five hundred in number, quit work a week ago because the screen was lowered at the head, making about one degree less incline. The railroads use nearly the entire output of these mines and had refused to accept the coal on account of the great excess of slack. The matter was left to arbitration. The arbiters decided that the screen being legal its pitch should be left with the operators as long as it did not deprive the miners of any part of their product. The miners are expected to return to work.

Chopped to Pieces.

Harry Clark of Gallipolis, Ohio, a brakeman on the Ohio River Railroad, was killed near that city. He was passing from one car to another, when the cars became uncoupled and he fell between them. His legs and one arm were cut off. He leaves a wife and three children.

Both Eyes Shot Out.

Robert Reynolds and his cousin, Grub Reynolds, were out hunting in Athens County, Ohio. Grub was climbing over a fence when his gun was accidentally discharged, the shot taking effect in Roberts eyes. Both eyes have to be taken out, and it is feared he will die.

Father's Brutal Crime.

Andrew J. Cutsinger, charged with improper relations with his 13-year-old daughter, was tried at Shoals, Ind., and the jury, after being out about two hours, returned a verdict of guilty, sentencing him to the penitentiary for six years.

Jack King Guilty.

Jack King, the fourth Mineral Ranger, Mich., train-robber to get in line for trial, followed the example of the trio ahead of him by pleading guilty to larceny, and was promptly sentenced to five years in the Marquette Prison.

REFORM THE TARIFF.

THIS SHOULD BE DONE WITHOUT DELAY.

Lighter Burdens for the People, Wider Markets and Greater Freedom Is Demanded—Tom Reed's Stupid Bluff—Mutual Foolishness Between Two Countries.

Let Reform Be Prompt.

The well-selected adage with which President Cleveland closed his appeal to Congress when he called it in extra session to wipe out the mischievous silver-purchase law applies equally to the work of tariff reform which awaits action at the regular session. He gives twice who gives quickly is especially true when the thing given is a change in legislation affecting the business of the country. The tariff certainly does that. We have little patience with the view that the only business affected by the tariff is that of favored manufacturers, and still less with the view that the sole effect upon such business is favorable. On the contrary, the tariff as it stands to-day affects, and for the most part injuriously, nearly every kind of business in the United States, from that of the manufacturer to that of the farmer; from the foreign shipper to the retail dealer; from the largest to the least of active interests; from the income of the millionaire to the wages of the workman. The people have decided with great deliberation and by repeated votes that the tariff shall be reformed and reduced. That was practically the decision in 1888, when the Republicans won enough votes to elect Mr. Harrison by the promises of reform afterward repudiated. It was distinctly the decision in 1890, when the House that passed the McKinley bill was turned out. It was still more distinctly the decision in 1892, when absolutely the only national issue of any importance between the parties was that of the tariff. The people, therefore, demand the reform of the tariff. They will have it, and they should have it with as little delay as is consistent with a well-considered measure.

Uncertainty of any kind is hurtful to business in proportion to the extent of the interests involved and the intensity and duration of the uncertainty. We are not inclined to underestimate the importance of the character of the bill to be passed this winter, but any difference between bills that have any chance of passing at all is insignificant compared with the importance of prompt action and the earliest possible dissipation of all doubt upon the subject. We see a great deal in the protectionist journals as to the evil of men not knowing what they have to fear. There is something in that, but not much. There is no considerable number of sound industries in the United States that have anything whatever to fear from an honest and judicious reduction of the tariff. What is really of very much more importance is that that the whole business community shall know what they have to hope for, and it is to satisfy this perfectly rational and just requirement, as well as to allay any apprehension on the part of the uninformed and to silence the partisan alarmists, that action on the reform bill should be pushed with energy and decision.

There is no occasion for hesitation on account of the recent elections. The pretense that they were a protest against tariff reform is ridiculously unfounded. Not one man in a thousand who failed to vote the Democratic ticket had any idea about the tariff in his mind. The party in power not only can go on and carry out the mandate of 1890 and 1892 in security, but it must do so. It is bound in honor to do it; it is the only safe course, and it is sure to win the confidence of the people who gave the mandate. That mandate was for an honest, careful, and fair reduction of the tariff, such a revision as will lighten the burdens of the consumer, give to industry cheaper materials and to our commerce the stimulus of wider markets, to our working people an increased demand for labor and a lower cost of living, and to the whole country an invigorating influence of greater freedom. A steady progress toward the goal (free trade) that Garfield set for his party, and which, that party losing sight of it, the people now seek through the Democracy.—New York Times.

A Very Stupid Bluff.

Tom Reed ought to have learned that this is too big a country for even his monumental impudence to frighten with a bluff. When Mr. Reed says that the Democratic party "dare not disturb the tariff," in view of the late elections, he says in effect that it dare not execute its commission from the people—dare not fulfill its twenty-times-repeated pledge, now that it for the first time has the power. As we said yesterday, the Democratic party dare not fail to reform the tariff. Nor has it any disposition to shirk its duty. Mr. Reed has developed a wonderful respect for the will of the people since he crowded a force bill through the House after his party had been rebuked and defeated by 1,300,000 majority in Congressional elections in which its record was the direct issue.

The tariff was not and could not have been an issue in the elections of Tuesday. The Republicans in Ohio, Massachusetts and Iowa used it as a scarecrow, as usual. But in the last two States the Republican plurality was but litte in excess of Harrison's. The only congressman elected anywhere was a Democrat in Michigan. The Democrats lose no legislature that will elect a senator. Nowhere was there a vote cast that can by any possibility affect the reform of the tariff which the present congress and administration were elected to carry out. The fight was over, that issue was closed last year. By a majority of 1,332,000 in 1890 and over 1,400,000 in 1892, directly upon this as the main issue of the elections, the people decided in favor of tariff reform through tariff reduction. It is imputing childishness or worse to the people to suppose that they were frightened from their deliberate purpose before the bill which they had twice demanded was even drafted. The election of Republican State officers in half a dozen States did not reverse the verdict of the nation. Tariff reform is needed. It has been decreed. It has been promised. It must come. It is coming.—New York World.

Jerry Simpson's Views.

Speaking of the Republican landslide in the East, Congressman Jerry Simpson, of Kansas, said to a Kansas City Journal man:

> It was simply the result of a scare among the masses. There are a lot of lunatics in the country who know nothing themselves and were made to believe by the Republican press that the threatened revision of the tariff portended evil to the working classes. Besides this, they blame the Democratic party for the existing business depression, which, as a matter of fact, is a result of iniquitous Republican legislation. The common people are like a man on a raft of saw logs. As one log sinks he jumps to another, hoping to keep himself afloat. They will finally get on the People's party log, which is big enough to support them. In New York the attempt of the machine politicians to force Maynard upon the people was responsible for the result. McKinley's election makes him the logical Republican candidate for President in 1896. The tariff question will be the issue again. We thought we had settled that question last year, but President Cleveland shoved it to the rear, and now it has got to be fought over again with the money question, an equally important issue.

Now for Tariff Reform!

Now let Congress take a whack at the upas tree of tariff oppression.—Nashville American.

The country will not treat the McKinley bill with as much gentleness as the people of Ohio have treated McKinley.—Boston Globe.

It now behooves Mr. Cleveland to see that McKinley's tariff law is wiped off the statute books of this nation without undue delay.—Chicago Times.

It is now expected that the new tariff bill will be ready in about three weeks from date. No postponement on account of the elections.—Boston Herald.

The Democratic administration and Congress cannot let the tariff alone. They are bound by the pledges and by the whole logic of their position to enter upon the work of revision.—Philadelphia Press.

While the tariff will be revised with a view to lessening the burden of taxation, especially upon materials of manufacture, this policy does not contemplate a reduction of the customs revenue, but rather a more equable distribution.—Philadelphia Times.

The next thing in order is to reform the tariff. This should be done at once and vigorously. Let the tariff be reformed and the financial system remain untampered with, and the wait for the return of good times will not be a prolonged one.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

Certainly no evidence is offered by the late elections that the people have repented of their desire, recorded twice over at the polls, first in 1890 and again in 1892, for a moderate and conservative reform of the worse-than-war tariff rates imposed by the McKinley act.—Baltimore Sun.

The demand for the reform and revision of the tariff is as strong as it was when the people of the country made it at the ballot-box in November, 1892; and there is no more excuse now than there was then for any failure on the part of the Democracy to heed the voice of the people.—Detroit Free Press.

The Rights of Hawaii.

The letter of Secretary Gresham dealing with the status of affairs between this country and Hawaii, is one that will be read with interest by all who have followed the course of events since the annexationists on the island asserted themselves and established a provisional government which secured the hasty recognition of the United States. The state document which the Secretary has made public is a full and candid review of the case from its inception, and, if correct in its details, is certainly correct in the conclusion that the independence of the Hawaiian Government should be restored, and that with this performance of a plain duty interference on the part of the United States should cease. The fact that Minister Stevens exceeded his authority and committed this Government to an act of gross and cowardly injustice is positively asserted, while the marines from the United States ship Boston gave aid, comfort and success to the revolutionists under the pretense of protecting the life and property of American citizens in Honolulu.

This showing accounts for several facts that were at the time of their occurrence a matter of general discussion. It will now be understood why the commissioners of the provisional government and the representatives of Queen Liliuokalani raced across the continent, each seeking to first gain the ear of Secretary Foster with the hope of securing favorable action on the part of the United States. It explains the hauling down of the American flag by Minister Blount when he reached Honolulu and there learned the true condition of affairs, but it does not make clear why Minister Stevens played the part of a usurper and made false representations to his government, afterwards admitting that they were false. Neither does it account for the undue haste with which the Harrison administration seized upon the opportunity for annexation and gave one of the most marked illustrations of jingoism in the whole history of the nation.—Detroit Free Press.

They Make No Mistake.

The New Bedford Journal (Rep.) asks who is responsible for the present tariff uncertainty, and goes on to reply by asking more questions and answering them, as follows, "Who is responsible for the election of Grover Cleveland and a Congress pledged to tariff reform?" Are the American people fools? Did they twice over rebuke the administration of Benjamin Harrison without cause? Did they make these rebukes the severest in their history simply from caprice? No, indeed. The American people are not fools. They rebuked the Republican party because, among other things, they promised to revise the tariff down and revised it up; because they promised a tariff in the interest of all the people and gave a tariff in the interest of sections, classes, and individuals; because they gave a tariff conceived in the thraldom of party necessity and consummated at the bid of campaign contributors, a tariff which was the product of politics first and only of patriotism when politics permitted.

Mutual Foolishness.

The Canadians bought last year 831,046 tons of soft coal mined in the United States, and they sold in the United States 680,388 tons mined in Canada. Both countries, in foolish disregard of the public interest, have imposed duties on imports of coal; and both countries would profit about equally by a repeal of the duties. The natural market for the coal mined in Eastern Canada is in the New England States. The soft coal mined in Ohio and Pennsylvania, because of its superior accessibility, forms the best source of supply for that part of Canada which can be reached by lake transportation. No doubt the repeal of the coal duty by the United States would be followed by reciprocal action on the part of the Canadian Government.—Philadelphia Record.

Honest, Impartial, Radical Reduction.

Discussing tariff reform the Indianapolis News (Ind.), says: "Perhaps it may be impossible to come to a purely revenue tariff all at once, but there should be no change in the existing law which does not tend directly and strongly that way. The principle should not be compromised. No step should be taken which it will be necessary to retract. Local interests should have no weight. Mr. Gorman's coal must go upon the free list. Louisiana sugar and Vermont sugar must be treated alike, and both interests should be deprived of the bounty which Mr. McKinley gave them. Carolina rice and New York barley are both entitled to protection if either is. In a word, there must be no favoritism. The new law ought to be an honest measure, and not a device for catching votes."

How the Foreigner Pays It.

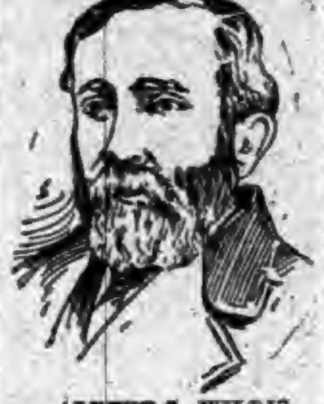
"Be gob, the furriner does pay the tax," said Pat as he saw his fellow shoveler, the macaroni eater, paying two cents more a pound for that compound than was the price before the McKinley law.

QUEEN NOT RESTORED

EXPECTED UPHEAVAL IN HAWAII HANGS FIRE.

Minister Willis Presents His Credentials to President Dole—Both Make Friendly Speeches, Indicating the Best of Feeling Between the Two Countries.

Quiet in Honolulu.



ALBERT S. WILLIS.

The anxiously expected steamship Australia, from Honolulu, arrived in San Francisco at 9:20 o'clock Saturday morning. She brought the news from Honolulu that there had been no change in the Hawaiian political situation up to the time of sailing, other than the presentation by Minister Willis of his credentials to President Dole of the provisional government and his acceptance of them. The speeches made by the American and Hawaiian on this occasion indicated the best of feeling between the two governments and President Cleveland's letters strengthened it. Absolutely nothing had occurred to mar the harmony of the international relations.

The Minister had done nothing toward restoring the Queen or deposing the provisional government. This cannot have been because he had received instructions from Washington countermanding previous ones, for there has been no time for that. A Washington correspondent says: It is possible he found the provisional government stronger than he thought it would be and not so easy to overthrow, and that he is waiting for additional instructions from Washington before he takes further action. The news is much better than was expected. It was feared that summary steps would have been taken by the Minister.

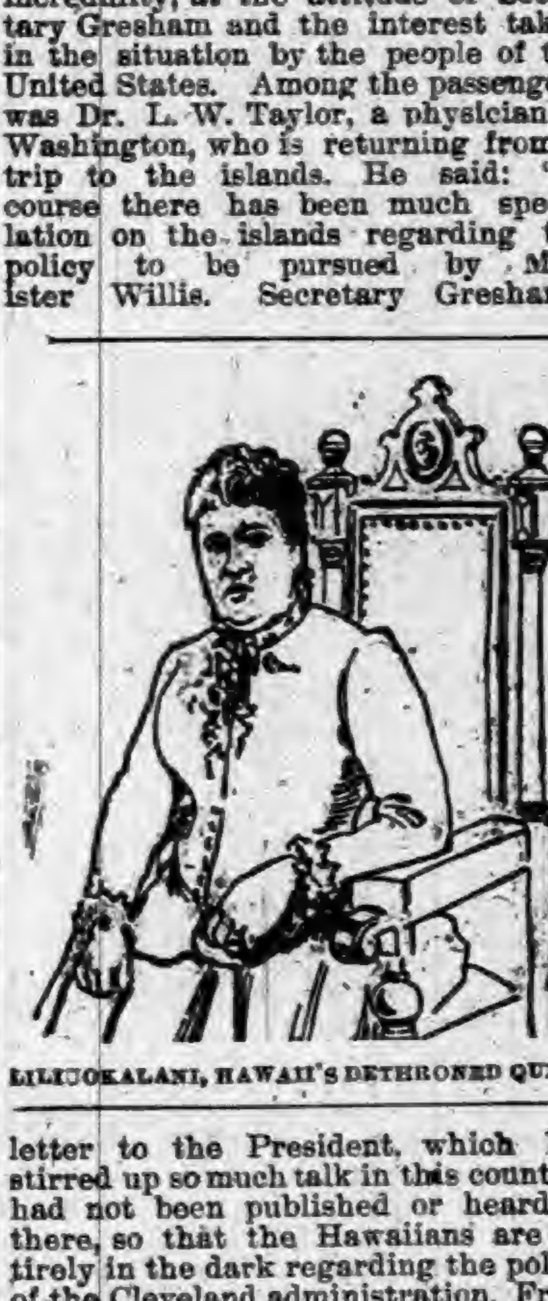
The advice of the Secretary of State to the President was—

> Should not the great wrong done to a feeble but independent state by an abuse of the authority of the United States be undone by restoring the legitimate government? Anything short of that will not, I respectfully submit, satisfy the demands of justice.

For some reason Minister Willis has not made much headway in the work of restoration.

Opinions of Passengers.

San Francisco advices say that the passengers on the Australia had nothing to say but to express amazement, amounting in several cases to positive incredulity, at the attitude of Secretary Gresham and the interest taken in the situation by the people of the United States. Among the passengers was Dr. L. W. Taylor, a physician of Washington, who is returning from a trip to the islands. He said: "Of course there has been much speculation on the islands regarding the policy to be pursued by Minister Willis. Secretary Gresham's letter to the President, which has stirred up so much talk in this country, had not been published or heard of there, so that the Hawaiians are entirely in the dark regarding the policy of the Cleveland administration. From what I learned on the islands I think it would be impossible for the queen, if reinstated, to retain her throne unless constantly backed up by the power of the United States. The feeling is very strong against a return to monarchy. If the queen were restored and the United States Government should then stand aside she could not retain the reins of government a week.



LILIUOKALANI, HAWAII'S DETHRONED QUEEN

Among those on the Australia was H. W. Severance, ex-United States Consul at Honolulu. Mr. Severance said: "No one at Honolulu has heard anything about the restoration of Queen Liliuokalani being contemplated by President Cleveland. There was no talk of bloodshed or resistance. In fact, so far as I have been able to learn, all the recent excitement over Hawaiian affairs appears to have been stirred up in this country. The provisional government is not making any special preparations to protect itself by force against a return to power of the Queen and has not received any large invoice of arms so far as I know. The public sentiment on the islands toward the Queen and the whole government is much the same as it has been."

Other passengers who were seen said the same things as Mr. Severance. All causes of disturbance or excitement were totally absent at Honolulu when the steamer left.

Claus Spreckels, the sugar planter who is so largely interested in Hawaii, was seen at his office in San Francisco after the arrival of the steamer. He stated: "My correspondence says that everything is as quiet as possible on the islands. It is the American papers which have been making all the fuss."

The sun shining into her room awoke her. Her first thought was of Sir Bertram. The incidents of the day before seemed like a distant, half-bewildered dream. Was it all true? Ah, yes! There were the daphnes, there, too, in her heart was the same strange, sweet music that bewildered while it delighted her. The world seemed so fair that morning; the sun was brighter than it had ever been. Lady Fanshawe looked in wonder at the lovely young face that greeted her with such a kindly, happy smile.

"Where are you going to-day, auntie?" she asked, as they sat down to the luxurious breakfast table.

"Have you forgotten, Leonie? The carriage is ordered for two. We are going to Lady Seagrove's fete at Chiswick."

Again the young Countess' first thought was a wonder as to whether Sir Bertram would be there. She would have liked to ask Lady Fanshawe if it was probable, but she could not utter his name.

"The Duchess is sure to be there," continued Lady Fanshawe, "and Lord Falcon, too. I should not be surprised, Leonie, if you were married in your first season."

"I should," she replied, with a gay little laugh. "Ah, auntie, when the world is so bright, why spoil it by speaking of such serious things?"

"Young ladies do not generally consider that love and marriage spoil the beauty of the world," observed Lady Fanshawe. "Now tell Florette that you must excel yourself to-day. Many girls look pretty in a ball-room who are not so pleasing in the daylight and sunshine. You look equally well in both."

CHAPTER XIV.

Lady Seagrove was the happy possessor of a grand old mansion at Chiswick. The grounds attached to it were extensive and beautiful; some of the finest trees in England were to be found there—stately oaks and spreading cedars, chestnut trees that were magnificent when in bloom, magnolias that filled the air around with perfumes, silver birches, aspens, copper beeches that looked like burnished gold in the sun. From the grounds there were some beautiful views of the river. Pretty seats and garden chairs had been placed under the trees.

Once during every season Lady Seagrove gave a grand fete in the grounds, and it was eagerly anticipated and enjoyed. After crowded theaters, heated ballrooms and their artificial atmosphere, it was refreshing to see nothing but green foliage and blooming flowers. Fair faces looked fairer in the sunlight, people were less artificial, less ceremonious there.

Lady Charnleigh was queen of the fete, as she had been queen of the ball. She looked daintily beautiful in her dress of rich Indian muslin, with its trimmings of costly lace; a pretty little hat shaded her lovely face, and gave a coquettish appearance that did not usually distinguish her. She looked around her, but did not see the one face and figure that had haunted her all night.

As soon as she appeared Lady Charnleigh was surrounded by a little knot of courtiers; first and foremost was Lord Falcon, who watched her delighted face with a smile.

"Is this the first fete you have attended, Lady Charnleigh?" he asked, when, after great maneuvering he had secured a seat by her side.

"Yes," she replied.

"I thought so; your face tells your every thought as plainly as your lips speak them."

"Then I must train my face," she said. "It is very inconvenient to have one's thoughts guessed."

Lord Falcon sighed.

"Why do you sigh?" she asked, simply.

"I was thinking that the fairer and more dainty the bloom, the more easily it is brushed from the flower. I was wondering if a few seasons in town would make you as artificial and worldly as other girls."

"I am worldly now," she said, with a low, rippling laugh; "that is, I love the world and everything in it."

"That is not being wordly, Lady Charnleigh," he rejoined, half sadly; then he looked at her in wonder—a beautiful light had come into those violet eyes, a sudden flush to the fair face. The flush died away, leaving the face pale, with the least possible quiver.

He had his own share of vanity, and believed that his words had moved her. How could he guess that in the far distance, between the waving foliage, she had seen the grand Saxon head and fair, handsome face of Sir Bertram Gordon?

All the serene and beautiful calm was over. Her heart beat, her whole soul was engrossed with one idea—would he learn that she was there? Would he come to speak to her? She said to herself that Lord Falcon, the greatest match in England, was a most tiresome man. She wondered why he persisted in sitting there talking nonsense and looking at her, while the young lord from her silence began to hope that at last he was making some impression upon her.

"I would make her an offer at once," he thought to himself, "but that my mother so strongly advises me to wait."

"I wish he would go away," thought Lady Charnleigh; "then perhaps Sir Bertram might see me."

She sat in silence some minutes longer, and then silence and inactivity became a torture to her. What if he should leave the grounds without seeing her? What if he should go away and she should never see him again?

"I wish to find Lady Fanshawe," she said, rising; and Lord Falcon, to his annoyance, saw that the interview was ended.

They found Lady Fanshawe deep in conversation with the Duchess; from the well-pleased faces of both, the subject had evidently been satisfactory. Then Falcoln left the heiress with a bow, inwardly resolving that the time should be as short as possible before he made her his wife. Then, oh, then the sun grew brighter, a deeper, fuller beauty fell on flower and tree, for Sir Bertram had seen her, and he was coming. Bright, sweet roses on her face, welcomed him, smiles for which some men would have bartered their life greeted him.

"I have been looking for you," he said, gently; and then it seemed to her that they went straight away into paradise. They left the Duchess and Lady Fanshawe together; silently they went down a long avenue of blossoming lime trees, too happy for words. They did not need speech to reveal their happiness in being once more together.

She asked him some commonplace question at last, and then they talked long and earnestly. How she hung upon each word that came from his lips! It was "the very honey of eloquence," she thought; everything he said struck her as being so true, so original; the very foundation of his character appeared to be truth. He was describing some adventure that he had met with years ago, when he happened to mention Captain Flemyng's name; she looked up at him with a glance of wondering pleasure.

"Do you mean my kinsman—if so distant a relation may bear the title? Is that the Paul Flemyng who would have had Crown Leighton but for me?"

"Yes," he said. "I had forgotten for the moment, Lady Charnleigh. I trust the mention of his name is not displeasing to you."

"Oh, no; why should it be? I should like to see him and know him."

"I knew him well before he went abroad," said Sir Bertram.

"Tell me more of Paul Flemyng," she said; "I should like to hear of him. I am entirely alone in the world, and he is like a relative, though he is only my fourth or fifth cousin."

"What can I tell you, Lady Charnleigh? It may interest you to hear that there is a rumor that his regiment is coming home."

"I am so glad!" she cried. "Of course, I love Crown Leighton very dearly, but I always feel sorry for him that he has lost it. Was it a great trouble to him?"

"I do not fancy that he would let it trouble him," replied Sir Bertram. "You do not know him, Lady Charnleigh; he has a grand soul—a hero's soul—as far above all envy, all greed, as the stars are above the earth. He realizes that one line of Tennyson's, 'Truest friend and noblest foe.'"

She looked at him with wondering eyes.

"Do you love him?" she asked.

"Men do not use that word when they speak of each other. Paul Flemyng was my friend."

She walked on some minutes in silence; then she looked at him with tears in her eyes.

"I wish Paul Flemyng would take half my fortune," she said; "I feel as though I had wronged him; yet I could not help being 'next of kin'—could I?"

"Certainly not. You are sure to have those feelings—you are generous and sensitive; when you know Paul you will understand and feel sure that he would not purchase his prosperity at any risk of yours."

CHAPTER XV.

There was an unusual stir in the military world; fresh troops were sent to Canada, new regiments to India, and in the general movement it happened that Paul Flemyng's regiment was summoned to England instead of proceeding to the East. It happened still more strangely that their place of destination was the pretty town of Weildon, not far from Crown Leighton.

Captain Flemyng, who had leave of absence, intended to spend the latter part of the season in London. General Sir Huntley Dacre, who was the very happy owner of a very fine town mansion, made the same resolve.

"It will not be like parting," said Ethel Dacre, when Paul came to bid her adieu. "We shall meet again in London."

And Captain Flemyng, all unconscious of the loving heart so sorely troubled for him, went on his way to London, wondering what the difference would have been had Crown Leighton been his. He received the warmest of welcomes—all the warmer and more kindly that people knew how calmly he had suffered a keen disappointment. His only puzzle was which of the numerous invitations lavished upon him he should select; he decided at length upon an independent course, and took apartments near Piccadilly. In this way he would please himself as to whither he might go and what he might do.

One of the first invitations he accepted was to Lady Denham's garden party—a species of entertainment quite new to him. It was arranged that Claude Denham, her ladyship's son and heir, should drive him down. Lady Denham had a beautiful house, surrounded by magnificent grounds on the banks of the Thames.

"You will see some of the handsomest women in London at my mother's garden party," said the hopeful heir of the Denhams; "and for my part, I consider a really handsome woman the finest work of creation. What do you say, Captain Flemyng?"

"I have the greatest reverence for all women," he replied, gravely, "but the question of beauty is not one that has hitherto interested me."

"I think all women ought to be good-looking. I cannot see why they are not."

"They are," asserted the young soldier, in perfect good faith. "I have never yet seen a woman's face that had not something beautiful and true in it."

Claude Denham laughed aloud.

"For Utopian ideas commend to me a soldier who has been abroad. I will show you a face to-day, Captain Flemyng, worth coming all the way from Malta to see."

They made their way to Lady Denham, who professed herself delighted to see Captain Flemyng.

"You will find many of your old friends here," she said. "Sir Bertram Gordon has been inquiring anxiously as to when you were coming."

"Now for the face I told you of," said Claude to Paul. "I do not see the lady at present; but wherever you notice two or three men looking as though they were moon-struck, be sure she is not far off."

They passed through several alleys under long rows of branching limes, and across a smooth greensward.

"Surely she is come," said Claude. "I know that my mother relied on her as the great attraction of the day. Ah!" he continued, with a little cry of admiration, "there she is! Now confess that in all your travels you have never seen a picture so fair!"

Paul Flemyng looked, and what he saw remained engraved on his heart until his dying day. Before him was a large white acacia-tree in full flower, its white blossoms falling where the wind carried them; underneath its branches was a pretty rustic seat, with the golden sunlight falling on the loveliest face ever dream of artist imagined—a face so bright, so fair, so tender, so radiantly lovely, so happy, that he was dazzled by it as a child who looks rashly at the sun. He saw violet eyes full of light, and golden hair that seemed to have made the sunbeams captive. A shining mass of palest pink silk and white lace draped the perfect figure and fell in sweeping folds; a little white lace bonnet a marvel of art, with one pale pink rose, crowned the golden head. The girl's beautiful face was bent over some white acacia blossoms that had been gathered for her.

"There," said Claude Denham, triumphantly—"have you ever seen anything like that?"

But Captain Flemyng made no answer. He did not know who she was; she might be a royal princess, she might be a singer, an actress, or a duchess, he did not care—she was his ideal woman found at last. His life in that moment grew complete; it was as though he had found something for which he had looked long and anxiously; it was such a face, bright as the stars, and lovely beyond comparison, as he had dreamed of, but had never seen.

"Who is she?" he asked at length.

"I was waiting for the question. She is no less a personage than Leonie, Countess of Charnleigh, at this moment assuredly the most popular and eagerly courted lady in the three kingdoms. You would like an introduction to her?"

"Not just yet," he replied. He wanted time to collect himself, to drink in the marvelous loveliness of that face, to watch the graceful movements of the little white hands—time to still the rapid beating of his heart, to quiet the thrilling of every nerve. Claude Denham gave a keen, sharp glance at his face, and then turned aside with a laugh.

"Where there are lights there will be moths; but I did not expect to see you so easily caught," he said; but Capt. Flemyng never even heard his words. His whole heart, his whole soul had gone from him—he stood there, as it were, without life, so intent, so earnest was his gaze.

So, for a long period, did Paul Flemyng stand aloof, watching the beautiful girl whose smiles were so eagerly courted, and then Lady Denham passed by. He went to her and spoke anxiously.

"Of course I will," replied her ladyship—"come with me." She led him through the little group of courtiers, and said:

"Lady Charnleigh, allow me to introduce to you Capt. Paul Flemyng, who has just returned from Malta."

Lady Charnleigh looked up with a start of amazement, that did not escape those around her. The color on her exquisite face paled, and a shadow came into her eyes as she repeated the name.

"Captain Flemyng," she said, "welcome home." She dropped the white acacia blossoms and held out her hand to him. She did not notice afterward that he picked up one of those flowers, as a miser does gold. "You have taken me by surprise. I heard that you were coming home, but I did not know that it would be so soon."

He looked at her dazzled, as though a wave of warm sunlight had fallen at his feet, and was unable, from very excess of emotion, to answer her; he felt when the silvery voice ceased to speak as though a strain of sweet music had passed away.

"When did you return?" she asked, seeing that he was deeply agitated and mistaking the cause.

"Last week," he replied, making a great effort to control himself.

"And you have never been to see me!" she continued. "I shall scold you. Shall we walk down to the river?"

The gentleman who had been talking to her drew back; Paul bowed low.

"Will you give me your arm?" she said. "I shall not allow you to treat me as a stranger."

She laid her little hand, so exquisitely gloved, on his arm, and his heart beat as it had never done before—so violently, indeed, that his face flushed. Far more bravely than he walked by the side of this young girl had he stood before the guns of the enemy.

Abe Hummel Is 5 Feet 1 Inch Tall, but He Wears a 7 3-4 Hat.

When "Abe" Hummel, the well-known criminal lawyer of New York, wishes to travel incognito he registers as Abraham H. Hummel. He was born in England forty-five years ago, but with his hat on does not, according to the Commercial Advertiser, look more than 25. He stands 5 feet 1 in his silk stockings, weighs 109 pounds, wears a mustache, but no hair on the top of his head. He is pretty well known in the courts in criminal and theatrical cases. For fifteen years he has been in partnership with William F. Howe. At first the reputation of the firm rested on the contrast in the size of the two partners; now it rests on Hummel's brain. "Abe" wears a 7¾ hat.

There's some mighty weighty argument in our remarks to-day, so you had better lend a willing ear to what we have to say:

A CASE OF COMPULSION.

Such Splendid Goods as ours were never before marked down so low, but we've got to have the money and the goods have to go.

It is not because it gives us either pleasure or profit, but because we are compelled to make the best of having bought a stock too large and too fine for these panicky times, that we inaugurate this

GREAT SURRENDER SALE

Of ours, which is now filling our store with eager buyers.

We overbought and overstocked ourselves, before the panic, with fine goods in every department; and now we must stand the loss, because we cannot help ourselves. These are all New, Seasonable and High Grade Goods—better than you'll find in any house in the county—and on them we srurender all the profit at the prices we are forced to quote.

Men's Suits and Overcoats.

Men's Suits—$3.50, $4.50, $5.00, $6.00, $8.00, $10.00, $12.00, $14.00, $15.00, $16.00, $18.00 and $20.00.

Men's Overcoats from $5.00 to $18.00.

Boys' Suits and Overcoats.

Boys' Suits in Knee Pants from $1.00 to $6.00.

Boys' Long Pants Suits from $3.00 to $15.00.

Children's Overcoats from $2.00 to $6.00.

Our goods cannot be bought any cheaper than we are selling them now.

How to Make Roads.

The latest idea as to the employment of prisoners is to put them to work on roads and on crushing stone with which to make roads. This would not interfere with any other industry and would secure us good roads. It would also make about 10,000 idle criminals do something to earn their living. The average taxpayer will hail with joy any such plan by which the lazy criminal he is helping to clothe and feed is obliged to do a little for himself. Give us the road work, and if criminals don't like it, let them behave themselves and keep out of jail and prison.

A Big "Infant."

Pig iron is a highly protected article, and the reason given for protecting it is the usual one, that it is "an infant industry" and so not able to compete with its stronger cousins elsewhere. The nonsense of all this appears when we find that the United States produces one third of of the total pig iron output of the world. We produce nine millions of tons a year, while our heaviest competitor, Great Britain, produces but seven millions. The same ratio is seen in the production of steel. So it is like a big brother asking to be protected against his baby brother.

Whitcomb Riley's poems on some similar work worth $5.00 to $7.00. Trustees, teachers, pupils and patrons of the schools will be present, and County Superintendent Merica will be there to assist. The manager of the disreputable Chicago Sun has been fined and imprisoned for sending that low down sheet through the mail. Yet the Garrett Clipper that occupies a lower plane is allowed to go on its filthy way rejoicing.

The Auburn Times and the Kendallville News have both sized up the disreputable Clipper gang at about the proper figure. The people who know the gang best, rate them nearest to the real value. But now and then a more distant neighbor, like the Kendallxille News has the right idea.

The only case where a member of congress was voted for at the recent election, was the Second District of Michigan, where a successor to the late Judge Chipman had to be chosen. As this was the only case in which the people voted for a man who would have a vote in making laws, it is significant that they elected a democrat, and by a big majority.

Q. A. Hossler, of the Warsaw Indianian has been very sick, with some rheumatic trouble. We sincerely hope he may get right at an early day. Quin is one of the best known and most popular of all the "charter members" of the "Northern Indiana Editorial Association" every member of which has in some way, at some time been placed under obligations to him for courtesies.

Some republican editors are positively silly when they demand that President Cleveland shall take charge of every little black-and-tan nation in remote parts of the earth, and see that it has just such a government as these same editors think best. If the people of the Sandwich Islands want King Calico and Queen Lillie, what business is it of ours? And what business is it of ours if they don't want 'em?

The little editor of the Albion Democrat had another small spasm last week. We had tried to impress on him that he had started out in the unpromising work of trying to attend to other people's business. If this statement will make it any clearer, we trust he will have the grace to direct his small energies to his own field of labor. The editor of this paper is not interested in the sort of twaddle the Democrat appears to enjoy.

It is strange to hear men complain that wheat and wool are low in price on account of our having a democratic administration. Don't these men know that if a tariff could secure high prices for these things, it would have done so long ago? The tariff on these articles has been kept up right along and in some cases, as on wheat, greatly increased. And all these laws were made by republicans and opposed by democrats. It is a shame that people should be so ignorant of laws that have existed for years and have been fully discussed.

The recent election was remarkable for wild majorities. Ohio went republican by about 80,000; but Virginia went democratic by about 50,000. New York showed a republican majority of about 40,000, but the democratic candidate for supreme judge was beaten by twice that. The trouble with him was he had been accused of judicial crimes and never acquitted, but was run for this high office because Tammany insisted on it. The people very properly objected. New York is liable to go 50,000 democratic next year. She is a big state, and votes as she pleases.

Queer Politics.

It takes a republican editor to put his foot in it. Among the mass of gush brought out by the recent republican victories, is a jubilant expression by a well known editor, "It looks as if the sheep had voted." Quite an idea. We have long known that republican tactics did not require any brains on the part of the leaders or the led, but it was left for one of their own leaders to call them "sheep." Then in another article he says, "The result of the late election can be readily perceived in the pleasing look of every sheep one meets." We feel constrained to add but one more thought to this muttony line of politics: We have often said and several times brought figures to show that the greatest number of ignorant voters were to be found in the republican party. But, with all this fact, we feel like defending the rank and file of that party against the above sweeping assertions of one of their leading lights.

Times Again Changes Hands.

The Auburn Times changed hands again this week, or partly changed. This time it adopted a practical printer. John Lochner having purchased Mr. Egan's share of the plant. Mr. Lochner is a printer and a young man of industrious habits, having been several years in the employ of the Dispatch of this place. He will bring to the establishment some knowledge of the mechanical part of the newspaper business. But really, without wishing to discourage anyone in his business, we cannot see where any money or much of any other success can come of running a third paper in Auburn. But, this is a free country and every man can dump his dollars where he pleases.

The Revival Meetings.

The great revival meeting at the M. E church came to a close Sunday night, and Mr. and Mrs. Frame returned Monday to their home at Jamestown, Ohio., for a week's rest, when they go to Greencastle and hold a similar meeting in the College Avenue M. E. church in that city. They are very successful evangelists and most worthy people. The result here was very gratifying. The number of conversions reached about 110, and there seemed to be an earnestness about the entire movement that was very encouraging.

MARTIN SHEETS.

Our Agent On the Road.

Our well-known former employe, L. B. Fretz, is again on the road in the interest of the Courier. He is authorized to do collecting and give receipts therefor, as well as to receive new subscriptions and to transact other business for this office. Any subscription or other money due us, can be paid to him, and will be properly credited. We ask our friends to extend him every courtesy. In many cases it will be a favor to our friends to meet a representative of the Courier and talk business over. Some of our more distant patrons do not get here often, and will, we think, be pleased to have our agent calls on them. We shall make these business call as friendly and as pleasant as possible, and trust our patrons will do the same. At all events there is no harm in becoming better acquainted.

Birthday Surprise.

Quite a pleasant party assembled at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Adam Heitz, near Butler Center, Saturday evening, Nov. 18, it being the eighteenth birthday of their daughter Anise. There were nearly fifty present, and the evening was spent by the young people in games, etc. They gave Miss Anise a lovely rocking chair, and they also came with their baskets filled with pie, cake, chicken, etc., and altogether it was a time long to be remembered.

Judge Maynard.

From Harper's Weekly.

Let us be thankful that election is over, and we are no longer called upon to exercise ourselves in the endeavor to determine what conduct is and what is not justifiable in a lawyer. The average layman usually knows whether he is doing right or not. If he really has doubts it is natural enough for him to consult a lawyer about it. But that he should have to consult himself as to the legality and morality of something a lawyer has done strikes him as a hardship. Many honest men have really distressed themselves within the last two months over Judge Maynard's case. Not a few were puzzled on the very eve of election by the imputation of misconduct against Mr. Bartlett, in drawing what turned out long afterwards to be a contract between two rascals for a partition of their "swag." It is not too much to say that is the earnest desire of many weary laymen in the state of New York that hereafter lawyers that are nominated for judicial offices may be tried before election, before competent tribunals, and that questions concerning their professional behavior may not again be left to the adjudication of lay voters.

Ex Sheriff Richard Williams died at his home in Albion last week. He was well known in this county, having been several terms sheriff of Noble county, and for several years proprietor of the Williams House, a popular stopping place for Auburn people. "Dick" had hosts of friends in both counties, and will be greatly missed.

George Lanning has already sold twenty-three car loads of coal this season. We have not learned how much Mr. Mader has sold, but as he is a regular dealer in this line it must be considerable. Is this great amount of coal sold another indication of a coming hard winter? It is certainly as sensible a sign as any of the old and popular ones that have been so far mentioned.

Geo. McCord had a queer little owl, at the Schaab Furniture Company's room, with which he had a good deal of fun. The little thing seemed asleep or dead, and as Mr. McCord usually had some fine specimens of his skill in stuffing and mounting birds on display there, nearly everyone thought the little fellow was stuffed. McCord would get them to watch the bird while he "turned on the electricity," and as the little fellow would turn his head every little while it did look as if electricity was doing it. But the bird was alive.

Wm. Ensley, who resides south of Garrett, was here Friday. Mrs Ensley, who met with a severe accident a few days ago, finds her injuries pretty severe. She had gone out to help the little boys to unhitch the team from the wagon, and by some oversight the tugs of one of the horses were not unhooked, and when the horse started up, the wagon was jerked, and he started to run, striking Mrs. Ensley, who was in front of him, throwing her down and stepping on her, breaking the right leg below the knee, one bone twice and the other once. Drs. Casebeer & Matheny were called and set the injured bones, and at last accounts she was doing as well as one can with such severe injuries. But it will take some time for perfect recovery.

A letter received from 'Squire Peter Wyrich, at Hartville, Mo., states that they have had hard times out there, the same as the rest of us. We gather, too, from what he says, that he has been laid up from work for some time, though he he does not state what the trouble was. We hope to hear of better fortune for him.

"Born to Mr. and Mrs. O H Downey, Sunday, Nov. 12, 1893, at Lacon, Ill., a seven pound son." That is the reading of a neat notice we received this week. Mr. Downey will be remembered as publisher of the Butler Review for a time, and they have many friends, especially at that place, who will be pleased to learn of their good fortune.

There are still several hundreds of our subscribers who have allowed their subscriptions to get two or three, or more years behind, and we have waited on them patiently since the hard times began a year ago last May. Now we think each ought to make an extra effort to square up. Waiting on so many has been a serious drawback to us, and now let us take a business view of it and get even or partly even.

Prof. A. M. Ribbany, a native of Syria, will preach in the Evangelical church next Sunday at 2:30 p. m. Subject: "Mission Work in the Holy Land." In the evening he will lecture in the First M. C. M. Brown, a rising young attorney from Hamilton, has settled in Auburn, and will make this his permanent location. He has entered into a law partnership with John W. Baxter, under the firm name of Baxter & Brown. Mr. Brown, some years ago, taught school in this county, and for several years past has been in charge of the graded schools of Hamilton, having filled this difficult position with marked ability. We welcome Mr. Brown as a new citizen and trust that his business and social relations may be of the most pleasant kind.

The Burford printing and bookbinding establishment in Indianapolis, was nearly destroyed by fire Saturday morning. The water thrown hurt the stock and half completed jobs more than the fire did. Loss about $35,000. We are glad it was not a total loss, for we don't know where our county officers would go to get their printing done. It might have put them to the trouble of sending their work to Chicago.

Henry Wilks was in town last week, and gave us some of his experience at the old home in Westmoreland county, Pa. He was back there last summer and found things much different from what he knew them as a boy, and much different from what it is here in Indiana. He has some land there on which is fine timber, and a man nearly took his breath away by offering $1 for an immense and lovely poplar saw tree, that would have brought over $30 here. He says many of the old farms are going to waste, the younger farmers preferring to go west.

The Syracuse Register objects to having any presents put on a Christmas tree at church, except the little gifts made to the pupils proper of the Sabbath school. We think this a good idea. The more elaborate and costly gifts made to members of one's own family should be made at home, where only the family circle will be witnesses. This is the true way. Costly gifts in public are pretty sure to make some sad and little heart still more unhappy. Give suitable gifts to the Sunday scholars, such gifts as the Sunday school can afford, serve all exactly alike, and let the matter end there. Let the little ones go home happy, each feeling he has been treated equal to the best.

I have handled and used a great deal of patent medicines, but never tried anything that gave as good results as this did." For sale by Robbins & McCord.

Are your children subject to croup? If so you should never be without a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough remedy. It is a certain cure for croup, and has never been known to fail. If given freely as soon as the croupy cough appears it will prevent the attack. It is the sole reliance with thousands of mothers who have croupy children, and never disappoints them. There is no danger in giving this remedy in large and frequent doses, as it contains nothing injurious. 50 cent bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

IT is said millions of dollars have been saved by dynamite in the construction of railroads. It is also certain that dynamiters want to blow up the capitalists who have saved the millions.

ALTHOUGH Dunraven cannot again reach for the America cup before 1895, under the terms of the deed of gift of the trophy, two other British yachtsmen will come for the cup next year. At any rate, the London Field says so. Let us hope that the Field is right.

THE Baroness Burdett-Coutts' latest philanthropical scheme has for its object the poor of Europe after their arrival in America. She believes that the emigrants need help immediately upon landing. In this she is not far wrong. As to the method of affording this assistance the baroness has not reached a definite conclusion.

SPEAKER PEEL, of the House of Commons, gets $30,000 a year, a magnificent private residence, which is his for life, horses, carriages, and other governmental recognition of the dignity of his position. The Speaker of the American House of Representatives, gets $8,000 a year, no house, no horses, no carriages, and pays out of his own pocket for moderate rooms in a hotel.

ONE might think that the days of the famous clipper ships were coming back on hearing of such a race between fast sailing vessels as that 15,000-mile voyage from Astoria to New York, round the Horn, in which the Reaper beat the Western Belle. Think of a captain so determined on record-making that he would stop but half an hour at Pitcairn Island, although the inhabitants had had no news for six months!

STEAD, the English editor who conducted the notorious Pall-Mall Gazette exposures of vice in high places in Great Britain, says that America and her people reminded him of Russia. If there were really much of Russia in the American make up, Editor Stead would now be on his way to the frontier for making invidious comparisons or being guilty of lese majeste or something equally reprehensible.

IT is gratifying to our racial pride to learn that many of the crafty Oriental fakirs in Midway who sold piasters worth 4 cents to the guileless American for $3 all summer found that a goodly proportion of their ill-gotten gains consisted of Confederate and extinct State bank bills when they came to "cash in." Fair exchange is no robbery, and a $5 Confederate bill is surely as valuable as a souvenir in Syria as a bogus Turkish piaster is as a souvenir in America.

THE Portland Oregonian, discoursing of the proposed centennial celebration of St. Louis in 1903 of the Louisiana purchase, is of the opinion that it will come too soon after the Columbian Exposition. "The American people," says the Oregonian oracularly, "will want to catch their breath, take a bath, and get a good night's sleep before they seriously discuss the question of another centennial." The American people in this part of the country, esteemed contemporary, take a bath somewhat oftener than once in ten years. Let St. Louis go ahead with its celebration. It will not interfere with the ablutions.

AMONG the curiosities of taste, the Parisian passion for self-exhibition at the morgue must hold a conspicuous place. The principal keeper at the morgue is said to have had many applications from persons eager to figure as corpses on the slabs of the dead-house. They were deterred by the official announcement that the temperature of the bodies was kept some degrees below zero. If this discomfort could have been endured for twelve hours, and if the authorities could have been persuaded to lend themselves to such a fraud, what materials for a coup in journalism would have been afforded some enterprising genius!

THERE are two classes of men about whom the public are actually tired of reading. One is the man who didn't know it was loaded. The other is the man who buys gold bricks. A case of the first sort has just occurred in one of the suburbs of New York City. Two young men were talking together at noon in the planing mill in which they worked. One of them found an old revolver and flourished it. He didn't know it was loaded, of course. But the next moment his companion was dead. An instance of the gold-brick idiocy occurred at Lyons, Iowa, where a wealthy farmer paid out $2,600 for a brick worth $8,000—and is, as the saying goes, out his $2,600. How men who live in this age can make such blunders passes comprehension. We advise them to subscribe to a newspaper, and by close application to its columns save themselves the trouble of learning by experience.

G. E. BAIRD, a gentlemen of Chicago, asserts, with some show of proof, that he is the real inventor of the big passenger wheel in the Midway. He said he thought it out in 1889. He got the wheel in his head so to speak—from thinking about the Eiffel tower. And what of it, Mr. Baird? Mr. Ferris built the wheel, which is quite another thing, and we are beginning to think not a less notable thing than thinking of it. While Mr. Baird was revolving the wheel in his brain, Mr. Ferris was revolving it between the Moorish Palace and the Cairo Street. There are many Edisons—in their minds. But there is only one Edison.

WE have often enjoined upon our readers the fact that it pays to push, and that the pushing man is the one who always succeeds. As a verification of this it now comes out that a young collegian, Charles Blakely by name, was a pushing chair-pusher at the World's Fair. Charles had the good fortune one day to push the carriage of one of the World's Fair, who is the daughter of an English millionaire. Charles pushed so well that he pushed himself into the favor of the young and handsome heiress, and the result was a speedy elopement. All that remains is for the rich father of the girl to open his arms and say: "Bless you, my children; bless you!"

THREE New York policemen found the night air a little chilly while patrolling their beats in Central Park, and took refuge in a little cottage which nestled in a bowery nook near by. They found eternal rest, for a leaky gas pipe was one of the features of this same picturesque cottage, and the escaping fluid soon conquered each of the blue-coated guardians of the peace who had deserted his post. They were dead when found. This retribution should serve a double purpose. It should be a warning to all sleepy coppers to beware of secluded vine-covered cottages when they steal away from their beats to rest, and it might also suggest to chiefs of police that a very good way to detect those officers who neglect their duty would be to provide some place with all the comforts of a home—or saloon—with a leaky gas pipe, where the shirkers might retreat. Of course, the plan would remove the derelict bluecoats from active participation in further events in this world, but as they would have already proved their unfaithfulness to trust, it is a question whether the los would be truly lamentable.

IT is a waste of time to theorize upon the causes of the terrible railroad wrecks that have followed one another during the last month—each being more fatal and horrible than its predecessor. One fact is evident—that the railroad system is essentially defective at some point, and that where direct responsibility is incurred the responsible person escapes punishment. Not one railroad official, from President down to brakeman, has been held to legal account for the loss of life in the recent "accidents." The "investigations" have amounted to nothing. So far as known, no special precautions have been taken to avert further disasters. The smash-ups continue, with increasing loss of life. This will have to stop some time. Self-preservation is the first law of nature, and the traveling public will not submit to be decimated. The railroads will have to do something to restore confidence. People will not travel when a journey involves as much peril as a pitched battle. The limit of endurance has been reached. The public will stay at home or travel on foot rather than incur the ever-present danger of death and incineration.

A CAR bearing the menagerie of Sells' circus tipped over in Missouri a few days ago, and three cages, containing lions, tigers and panthers, broke loose and took to the woods. There was great consternation in the neighborhood when the facts were known. Women and children kept pretty close indoors, while men walked around carrying the heaviest loaded guns they could procure. One cow was killed and partly devoured by the tigers. The circus men finally got the wild animals inside their cages. They were too frightened to attack men, and the cages were baited with the fresh meat to which they were accustomed. The men drove the animals toward the cages, and when they entered the doors were closed. One black panther attacked a bull dog, and after a short tussle the panther got the worst of it. The bull dog got him by the throat, and was proceeding to choke the wind out of him when the circus men arrived and separated them. They offered the owner of the dog $25 for him, but the owner refused to sell at any price. A dog that can lick a black panther was just what he wanted to match against all other dogs.

Sir George Was Astonished.

After a division of the House of Parliament on a motion of Mr. Fox, Sir George Young, who had been drinking all day instead of attending to his Parliamentary duties, insisted on addressing the House; but, beginning with "I am astonished," could proceed no further. When he had repeated these words seven times, the House was convulsed with laughter. The baronet appealed to the Speaker, who pleasantly inquired what he would have him do. Sir George grew very warm at this, and declared he would not give up his favorite word, "for," said he, "I really am astonished, Mr. Speaker." By the advice of friends, however, he was presently prevailed upon, after repeating the word a dozen times more, to change it to "surprised," after which, having entirely forgotten what he had intended to say, he sat down.

THANKSGIVING DAY.

IT ORIGINATED WITH THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

The New England Origin of the Festival and How It Has Enlarged Its Significance —The Colonial Meeting-House—Sermons, Mince Pie and Turkeys.

From Fasting to Feasting.

Of all our national holidays none is more universally or more joyously celebrated than that of Thanksgiving Day. Though of New England origin and for many years confined almost exclusively to that section, it has slowly but surely extended itself all over our great country.

We are indebted for it to the Pilgrim Fathers, who may be said to have celebrated it for the first time upon the completion of their first harvest at Plymouth in 1621, when Gov. Bradford sent out four fowlers in search of game, that they "might after a more special manner rejoice together." But fasts were much more common among those hardy Puritans than feasts, and though they occasionally observed a general thanksgiving day for some specially propitious occurrence, such as some action favorable to them on the part of the mother country or the arrival of a shipload of provisions, they devoted much more time to deploring their miseries than they did to rejoicing over their blessings.

It is said that their adoption of the custom of annually appointing a Thanksgiving Day was due to a sensible old farmer—whose name tradition has unfortunately failed to preserve—who rose up when it was proposed in the Assembly to proclaim another fast, and plainly told them that he believed God was weary of their complaints, in view of the fact that He was causing the earth to reward their labors; that He had filled the seas and rivers with fish, had made the air sweet and the climate healthful, and was permitting them the full enjoyment of civil and religious liberty. The speaker therefore proposed that instead of a fast a day of feasting and thanksgiving should thereafter be annually proclaimed, which sensible suggestion was unanimously adopted. Whether or not this is a true account of the origin of that practice, it is a thoroughly established fact that by the year 1680 it had become a fixed custom for the Governors of the colonies of Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay to appoint a Thanksgiving Day late in the autumn of each year—a usage that soon extended to all other New England colonies.

The adoption of this custom outside of New England was very slow. How slow will be readily understood from the fact that as recently as 1855 it was considered a remarkable event in Virginia when Gov. Johnson recommended the observance of a Thanksgiving Day, and that Gov. Wise refused to appoint one in 1857 on the ground that he had no authority to interfere in religious matters. Thanksgiving Day was not regularly appointed by the Governors of New York until 1817.

During the revolutionary war Congress annually recommended a general Thanksgiving Day. Washington proclaimed one in 1789, on the adoption of the Constitution, and another in 1795 for the suppression of the whisky insurrection in Western Pennsylvania, while Madison proclaimed one for peace with England in 1815. After Madison, Abraham Lincoln was the first President to proclaim a Thanksgiving Day, and he did it in 1862 and 1863 for war victories. In 1864 he proclaimed a Thanksgiving Day in November for general blessings, and his example of that year has since been annually followed by every one of his successors and by nearly every State Governor down to the present time.

But popular as Thanksgiving Day now is throughout the length and breadth of this land, it is in New England that it still continues to be what it has been for more than two centuries—the greatest and most eagerly anticipated holiday of the entire year. The old Puritans and their descendants, who so long frowned severely upon Christmas—which, indeed, many of the latter still continue to do, refusing to give it any recognition whatever—found an excellent substitute for its cheerful hilarity, peace and good-will in Thanksgiving Day. For at least a week before the important occasion all was activity in an old-fashioned rural New England household. A bushel or more of the best wheat was sent to the mill to be converted into flour. Great rounds of beef were chopped up into mincemeat. Cartloads of yellow pumpkins, with an abundance of milk, spices, ginger, molasses and sugar, were made up into pumpkin pies. An abundance of turkeys, chickens and geese were killed and made ready for roasting. A pair of immense plum puddings were baked in the largest sized earthen pots, with Indian puddings and custard puddings to match, while there was baking of pound cake, plum cake and sponge cake from morning till night.

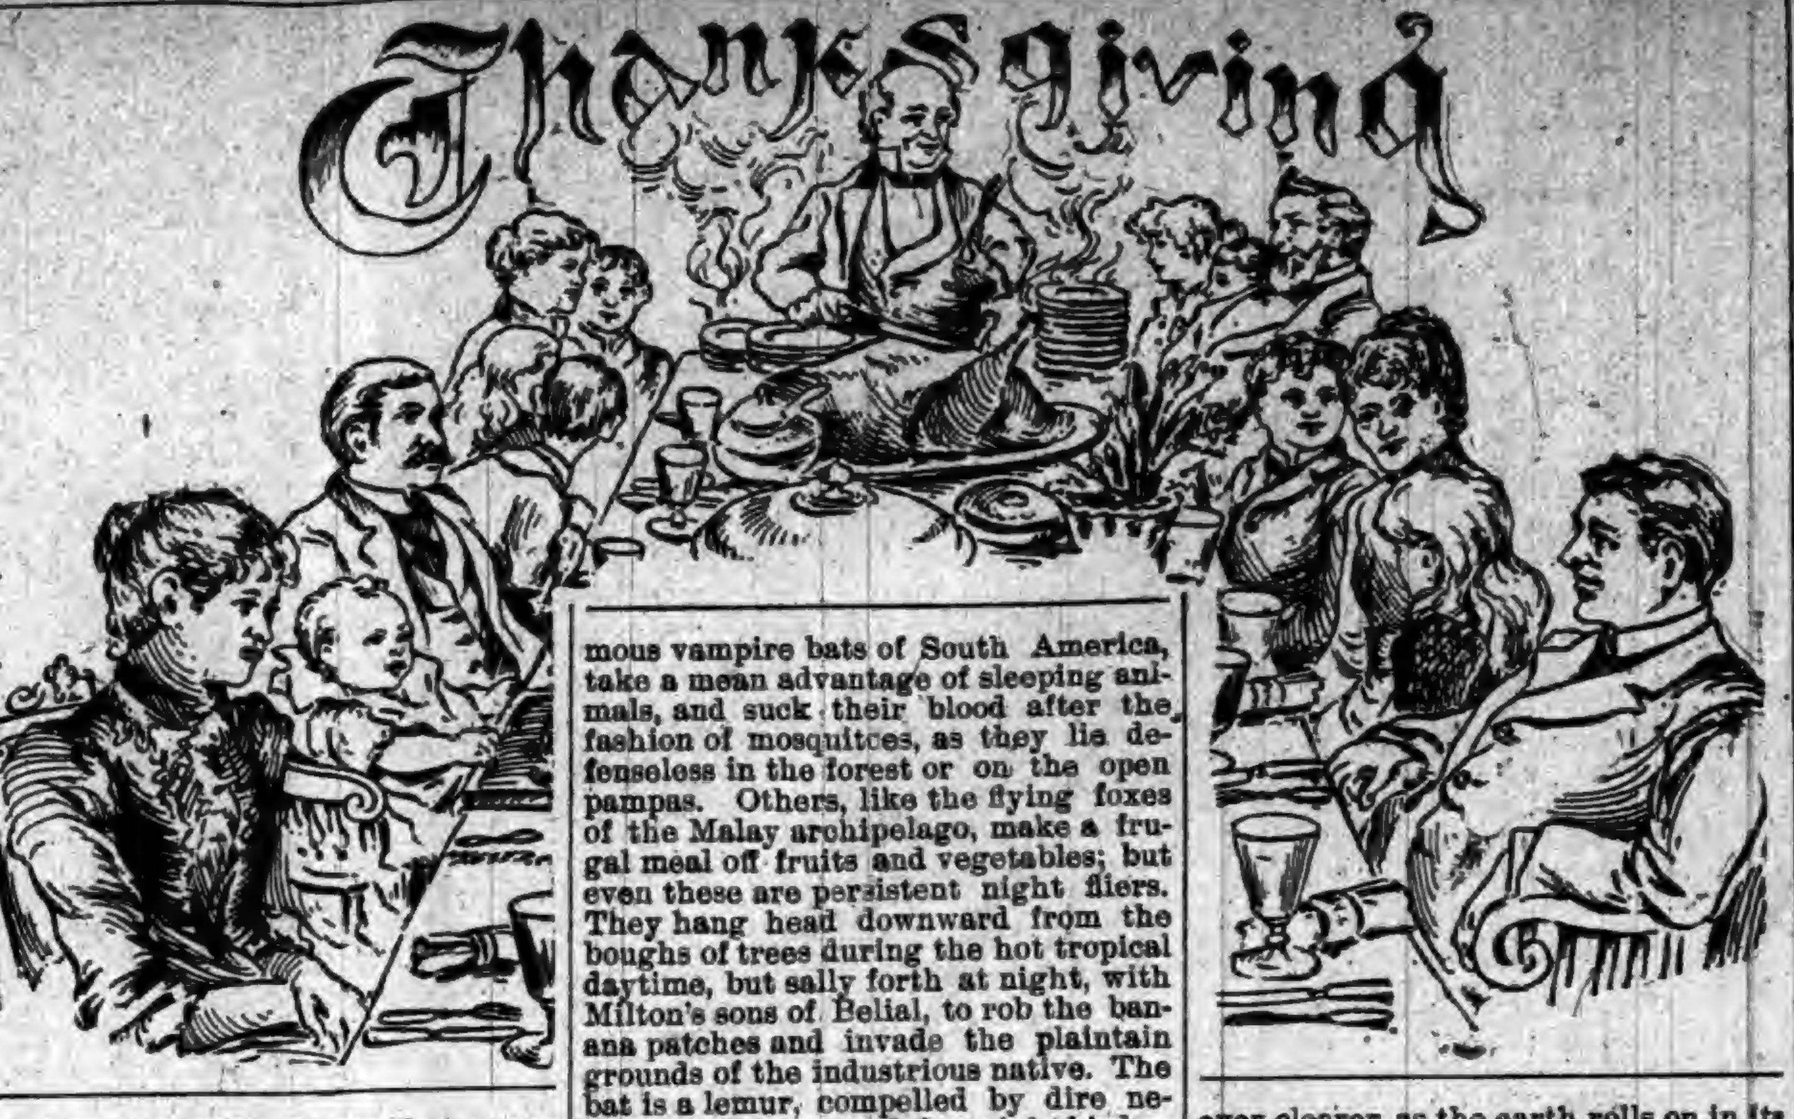
For the following quaint account of an old colonial Thanksgiving church service and dinner I am indebted says Geoffrey Christine, to a letter written in the year 1714 by an ancestor of mine, the Rev. Lawrence Conant, of the old South Parish in Danvers, Mass., and still preserved as a most precious heirloom in my family:

> Ye Governor was in ye house, and her Majesty's Commissioners of ye Customs, and they sat together in a high seat by ye pulpit stairs. Ye Governor appears very devout and attentive, although he favors Episcopacy and tolerates ye Quakers and Baptists. He was dressed in a black velvet coat, bordered with gold lace, and buff breeches with gold buckles at ye knees, and white silk stockings. There was a disturbance in ye galleries, where it was filled with divers negroes, mulattoes and Indians, and a negro call'd Pomp Shorter, belonging to Mr. Gardner, was called forth and put in ye broad aisle, where he was reproved with great carefulness and solemnity. He was then put in ye deacons' seat between two deacons, in view of ye whole congregation; but ye sexton was ordered by Mr. Prescott to take him out, because of his levity and strange contortion of countenance (giving grave scandal to ye grave deacons), and put him in ye lobby under ye stairs; some children and a mulatto woman were repremanded for laughing at Pomp Shorter. When ye services at ye meeting house were ended ye council and other dignitaries were entertained at ye house of Mr. Epes, on ye hill near by, and we had a bountiful Thanksgiving dinner, with bear's meat and venison, the last of which was a fine buck shot in ye woods near by. Ye bear was killed in Lynn woods, near Reading. After ye blessing was craved by Mr. Garrish, of Wrentham, word came that ye buck was shot on the Lord's day, by Pequot, an Indian, who came to Mr. Epes with a lye in his mouth, like Ananias of old. Ye council, therefore, refused to eat ye venison, but it was afterward agreed that Pequot should receive forty stripes, save one, for a lyeing and profaning ye Lord's Day, restore Mr. Epes ye cost of ye deer; and considering this a just and righteous sentence on ye sinful heathen and that a blessing had been craved on ye meat, ye council all partook of it but Mr. Shepard, whose conscience was tender on ye point of venison.

OLD THANKSGIVING FUN.

Rev. Dr. Talmage Recalls a Thanksgiving of His Boyhood.

How my mind is crowded with Thanksgiving memories! On no other day does my memory become such a kaleidoscope, and as I sit here in my darkened room and write, almost every minute the scene changes. I give to the kaleidoscope of memory a turn, and there they are, natural as life, around the country hearth on a cold winter night. I hear the hickory fire crackle, and see the shadows flit up and down the wall. Games that sometimes well-nigh upset the chairs—"Blind-Man's Buff," "Who's Got the Button," "The Popping Corn," "The Molasses Pudding," and the witch stories that made the neighbors' boys afraid to go home after dark. Hickory nuts on one dish, roseate apples on the other. The boisterous plays of "More Bags on the Mill," "Leap Frog," "Catcher," around and around the room until some one got hurt and a kiss was offered to make up the hurt, the kiss more resented than the hurt. High old time! Father and mother got up and went into the next room because they could not stand the racket. Then, instead of compunctions of conscience, a worse racket. The mothers and wives came in the afternoon, all wrapped up from the cold, and their feet on a foot-stove. When they got warm and took out their needles and sat down it was a merry group and full of news. Once in a while a needle would slip and make a bad scratch upon the character of some absentee, but for the most part it was good, wholesome talk. And in the evening, when the young people came and the old people were in one room and the young people in another, in the latter there was some lively stepping, while the black boy played "Moneymusk;" even grandfather in the next room, who had distributed many tracts on the sin of dancing, was seen to make his heel go. It seemed to me a great fuss and a great gathering to get one quilt made. But the fact was, that good neighborhood was quilted, warm sympathies were quilted, lifetime friendships were quilted, and connubial bliss was quilted. And they stayed late. And such plays as you had in that back room when you joined hands, and one of the loveliest stood in the ring! What a circumference to what a center! But now the scene is fading out. The old fireplace is down, and the house is down with it. One of those boys went to sea and was never heard of. Another became squire in a neighboring village. Another went to college and became a minister. Another died the following summer, until now they are all gone.—T. De Witt Talmage, in Ladies' Home Journal.



BOBBY'S THANSGIVING.

AT a table fairly groaning under everything that's good
That you or I could think of in the catalogue of food,
There sat a happy family, as jolly as could be,
To celebrate Thanksgiving Day with due festivity.

The boys, with mouths wide open, kept their eyes upon the tray,
As if the turkey on it would spread wings and fly away;
The while the girls sat up quite straight, their dignity at hand,
And by their prim example gave the boys a reprimand.

Would make a Chesterfield unquiet, forget himself and stare.
How can we blame the hungry boys if they perchance betrayed
Conspicuously the fact that they had stomachs to be stayed?

Above the steaming turkey rose the master, six feet tall,
And silence, deep, impressive, fell alike on one and all.
He bowed his head and reverently, in language full and clear,
He thanked our great Creator for the blessings of the year.

And when the simple prayer was done, thus the good father spoke:

"My children, it becomes each one his blessing to invoke;
Therefore let each one here thank him for this Thanksgiving treat,
For all the favors he has shown, and these good things to eat."

With trembling voice and reverent air each pious one bowed low
And thanked our Heavenly Father great that he had blessed them so,
For all the good things, and their home, to them a hallowed spot,
Until it came to little Bob, the smallest of the lot.

And thus he spoke, his head bowed down, while round he glanced an eye:
"I fank Thee for the turkey and the great big chicken pie;
I fank Thee for the other fings"—at this prospect of bliss
He paused, and then—"say, mamma, please, w'at's comin' after this?"

Nocturnal Creatures.

Most curious in origin of all nocturnal insect hunters are the leather-winged bats, which may be regarded, practically speaking, as very tiny monkeys, highly specialized for the task of catching nocturnal flies and midges. Few people know how nearly they are related to us. They belong to the self-same division of the higher mammals as man and the apes; their skeleton answers to ours, bone for bone and joint for joint, in an ordinary manner; only the unessential fact that they have very long fingers with a web between as an organ of flight prevents us from instantly and instinctively recognizing them as remote cousins, once removed from the gorilla.

The female bat in particular is absurdly human. Most of them feed off insects alone; but a few, like the famous vampire bats of South America, take a mean advantage of sleeping animals, and suck their blood after the fashion of mosquitoes, as they lie defenseless in the forest or on the open pampas. Others, like the flying foxes of the Malay archipelago, make a frugal meal off fruits and vegetables; but even these are persistent night fliers. They hang head downward from the boughs of trees during the hot tropical daytime, but sally forth at night, with Milton's sons of Belial, to rob the banana patches and invade the plaintain grounds of the industrious native. The bat is a lemur, compelled by dire necessity to become a flying night bird.—Cornhill Magazine.

TURKEY WITH SAUCE.

THERE was once a turkey who was a cripple. When his brethren scratched and scrambled for seats at the first table, he was rudely pushed aside and left behind. This gave him much time for meditation, so he stood by the pump and reflected upon the folly of too ardent eating.

"These fowls," thought he, "think only of the pleasure of the moment," for though he was yet young he observed that the plump, self-indulgent among his kind were earliest invited to ride in the market "death-cart," or pitilessly dispatched upon the farmer's own private guillotine. He grew old and waxed wise. He could have challenged the calendar in knowledge of Xmas and Thanksgiving days. Choice might have made him a sybarite, necessity made him a philosopher, and he learned to be thankful in a grim, hungry sort of way for the infirmity that kept him out of danger. A great pity filled his soul. Was it not his duty, nay his highest privilege, to teach his fellow turkeys this doctrine of abstinence unfolded to him by his affliction? He was a modest turkey, sensitive to a degree, but conscientious. He was not a bird to shirk duty, so lifting up his voice he gobbled unto all that feathered throng. He gobbled from his heart. What stories he told of countless bloody deeds! There was not a dry eye in the audience. He told of the near approach of Thanksgiving Day. All were impressed, attentive, subdued. [They had just demolished a huge dish of corn.] There was, for a time, profound silence over all the barnyard.

But the doctrine of abstinence is never a popular one, and long before the farmer's wife again threw out the food a frisky young turkey strutted over to the pump and publicly invited the philosopher to hear his side of the story. A great flapping of wings greeted his audacity, for "cheek" is a talent even in turkeydom. Clouds of dust announced that the meeting was to be a crowded one. Big chicks, little chicks, geese, ganders, even goslings elbowed—pardon, winged—with the turkeys to hear what this young fellow could say on this, the burning question of the hour. With so many quills present it is monstrous that there should be no verbatim report of the masterly oration. It was a strong rendering of the well-beloved old text, "eat, drink and be merry." The speaker gave a graphic description of the happy lot of his hearers, showing them how rarely fortunate they were in that their greatest pleasure was at the same time their highest duty. He gobbled with burning satire upon his "learned friend" who would have them live for this life alone. He asked his audience if it were creditable that in this nineteenth century a turkey so well posted as his "esteemed adversary" had not heard of the doctrine of evolution. Here he painted in scholarly language the slow transition from turkeydom to humanity by the Darwinian route.

His audience was depressed—it seemed such hopeless waiting—that long, slow, infinitesimal changing. Then, in that moment of inner anguish, he burst upon them this climax: "And yours, yours, my winged brethren, is the power to leap across this multitude of intermediate stages, this frightful chasm of time, to become in a few brief hours a part of man, a living factor in the noblest work of nature. You have only to be young and plump and tender to be with one blow, and a little dressing, translated to the realms of your highest dreams." Such cackling! Such crowing! Such quacking! Such gobbling! It woke the farmer's man to a remembrance of unfulfilled instructions and the orator turkey turned pale as he felt that firm, relentless clutch upon his long red neck. There were many deaths that day, but the philosopher stood by the pump unharmed. He, of course, saw the fallacy of his late friend's reasoning, but as deceased was no longer his rival he called him a "promising young turkey" and was even tolerant of those gobblers who shook their wicked old heads and said, "of a truth the good die young." The orator turkey was buried on Thanksgiving day, in the Smith family. No flowers. After-dinner speeches of a rare order were delivered, however.

A Suggestion.

Thanksgiving Day means much in the larger sense, and it were well for the country if we added to our present happy domestic and churchly custom of observing it by some distinctly public ceremonial that would associate more directly our well being with the thought of the nation's work and mission.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Chant of the Thanksgiving Glutton.

I never had a sweet gazelle
To glad me with its soft black eye—
But I would love it passing well
Baked in a rich and crusty pie.
If I could have a bird to love
And nestle sweetly in my breast,
All other nestling birds above,
The turkey—stuffed—would be that bird.

Reason for Thankfulness.

It is time for devout thanksgiving; because the world is no worse than it is, and man's future is so bright, because the joy and wealth of life are as well distributed as they are, and better than ever before, because the movement of humanity is constantly upward and the revelation of God's goodness is ever clearer as the earth rolls on in its appointed path.—Syracuse Standard.

Digging for Treasures.

The attention paid to St. Luke's Hospital, the institution in which the Vanderbilts are interested, is doubtless responsible for the revival of stories concerning the burial of treasure, decades ago, on the sight of that granite pile. Gold, silver, and jewelry that would make a Monte Cristo feel poor in comparison figure in the narrative of these who place faith in these legends. A hospital patron, who is very near the Vanderbilts, gives this account of it all:

"The treasure story originated years since, owing to the find of misers' hoards near the hospital lot. So far from there being a wish to dig for treasure on the grounds, I doubt if there has been the remotest whisper of such a thing. Indeed, most of the officers and patrons of St. Luke's do not know that treasure was even supposed to be buried near the hospital. There is absolutely no foundation for the story."

"What of the report that St. Luke's people repudiate the treasure story so as to get it themselves?"

"Well, if anyone thinks there is a fortune under the ground, let him buy the property and begin digging."—New York special.

Thanksgiving Like All Gaul.

Like All Gaul, Thanksgiving may be divided into three parts—the Thanksgiving of worship, the Thanksgiving of feasting and the Thanksgiving of amusement. There is a small but determined fourth part, which might be termed the Thanksgiving of nightmare, but, broadly speaking, this may be included in the amusement column.—Unidentified.

Conclusive.

"Here's a queer story about a turkey that died for grief. I don't know whether it is intended to be pathetic or whether it's a joke." "What do you find it in?" "A London comic paper." "Then it's no joke."—Chicago Tribune.

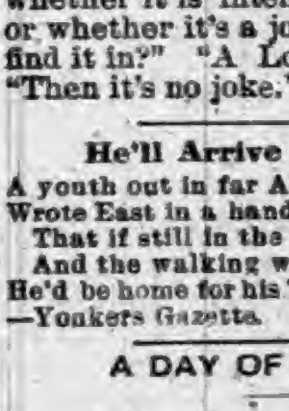
A DAY OF REJOICING.



BACK to the home of childhood,
Though scattered far and wide,
Back to the dear old kitchen,
Yes, back to your mother's side.
Come, kiss her wrinkled forehead,
Her hair, as white as snow,
And sit down on her footstool,
As in the long ago.

While father bends above you,
Weak with the weight of years,
His trembling voice with gladness,
His dim eyes filled with tears
To both the greatest pleasure
The year brings on its way
Is this, the glad home-coming
Upon Thanksgiving Day.

Once more the rooms re-echo
From kitchen, stairs and hall,
The sound of old-time voices,
And merry dinner call.
While many sweet grandchildren,
With laughter light and gay,
Come pressing round the table,
This glad Thanksgiving Day.

So come, ye sons and daughters,
From restless city strife;
Come, ere you lose your relish
For the quiet joys of life;
Come back, ye roving children,
From prairies far and wide,
And cluster round the hearthstone
Once more at eventide.

Take up the song of childhood,
And sing it o'er again;
Forget that ye are matrons,
Or business-loving men.
And if your eyes grow misty,
Rejoice that it is so;
A heart sincerely tender
Is the purest one to know.

Remember, with your loved ones,
Life's lamp doth feebly burn;
Your parents may not linger
To greet a late return.
Forget them not, though patient,
Oh, come now while you may;
Praise God—rejoice together—
On this Thanksgiving Day.

SUBJUGATION OF THE DESERT.

Surprising Results Obtained by Irrigation in the Southwest.

We have a vast domain of arid land which, under scientific irrigation, will some day support a great population. The Mormons have compelled the desert to produce fruits, grasses, and cereals in abundance, and Joseph Smith's followers may justly claim to be the pioneers in the practice of that sort of agriculture on a large scale in this country, though the ancient mission farms and vineyards of Southern California were irrigated in a crude way. What the Mormons did half a century ago and the Spanish missionaries more than a century earlier still, the modern farmers of California, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, and half a dozen other States and Territories are now repeating with profit and on a rapidly increasing scale, until 3,600,000 acres of land, comprising 54,000 farms, are now under irrigation and the average value of their products ranges from $8.25 to $49 per acre.

Surprising results are obtained on these lands where man is his own rainmaker, for the soil is of the richest, and once the irrigation system is in operation there is no interruption by drought. The magnificent crops of corn, alfalfa, wheat, and hay obtained, the wonderful yields of fruit and the possibility of uninterrupted pasturage for cattle have given a great impetus to irrigation in the far West and the next few years will witness a rapid expansion of the productive area of that region. Less than one-half of one per cent. of the total arid region of the country is now under irrigation, and of the 883,000,000 acres so classified there are 616,000,000 acres upon which water would produce crops. Of the remaining vacant public lands, ninety-five per cent., or about 542,000,000 acres, are in this region.

The free arable lands having been taken up and land that was cheap a few years ago rising rapidly in value, it is easy to see that the next step must be the reclamation of the "Great American Desert" by irrigation.—Minneapolis Tribune.

Crazy France.

It became positively dangerous during the Revolution to pronounce the word royal or king, and especially the name of any monarch who had reigned in France. The innocent King of "Twelfth Night" was suppressed, and the nomenclature of the "devil's picture boards" thoroughly revised. For a little while the king of diamonds and of clubs became indiscriminately the "executive power" of diamonds or the "veto" of clubs, but the card manufacturers, Urbain Jaume and Jean-Demosthene Dugoure, averred in Le Journal de Paris (March, 1793) that "a stanch Republican, even when playing a game, ought not to use expressions which constantly remind all his hearers of a state of despotism and inequality." Hence, they inform all and sundry that for the future the products manufactured by them will bear entirely new titles, the tyrants will become genii, their consorts "liberties," jacks "equalities," and aces "laws."

The term, "reine-abeille," the term applied to the unique honey bee in the hive by French naturalists, was changed into "l'abeille pondeuse." Citizens whose name happened to be Leori (King) were invited to change it into Laloi, (law), and the sight of a King, even under adverse circumstances, grated so terribly upon the patriots' nerves that one day a shop was sacked in the Palais-Egalite because its window contained an engraving of Charles I. on the scaffold.

Nowhere did the objection to words quasi-distinctive of the old regime become so tyrannical as in the playhouse. The slightest allusion to the monarchy provoked a disturbance, nay, a riot, which nine times out of ten had to be quelled by the intervention of the authorities. Cliton, in Corneille's Menteur, says:

Elle loge a la place et se nomme Lucrece
Quelle place? * * * Royale.

The last word had scarcely left the actor's lips when the house rose at him as one man. "Il n'y a plus de Place Royale; c'est la Place des Piques," they howled, and, in spite of meter and everything else, the line had then and there to be repeated, as corrected by the audience.—The Fortnightly Review.

Comfort in the Nursery.

A bamboo screen with silk curtains, or better still, those of some washable material, is a most useful adjunct, writes Elisabeth Robinson Scovil in a useful article on "Furnishing the Nursery" in the Ladies' Home Journal. It can be used to shield the crib from a draught, to screen a corner, or shut off the washstand when it is in use.

If the nursery is far from the kitchen a small refrigerator will be found a great convenience. Tin ones can be purchased for about three dollars that answer the purpose admirably. There is room for the supply of milk for the day, beside the ice, and they are easily kept in perfect order.

If the baby is fed on artificial food some means should be provided for heating it; an alcohol lamp, a contrivance to fit on the gas burner, or a covered saucepan alone, if there is an open fire.

No nursery should be without a thermometer, and when it varies much from 68 degrees the source of heat must be attended to.

A clock is always interesting and amusing to children, and as they grow older is useful in teaching them to tell time.

Besides a closet for the playthings that are owned and used in common, each child should have a receptacle for its own peculiar treasures, which it should be required to keep in order. The top of the chiffonier is a good lodging place for the fragile belongings whose destruction by the heedless younger ones is always so heartbreaking to the careful owner. A low cupboard, divided into compartments, is the best if it can be had. A small bookcase must not be forgotten, with room for the toy books of the babies, as well as for the books of the other members of the nursery.

She'll Soon Own the Universe.

The persistence of the crank is one of the most extraordinary attributes of the genius. When Gen. Grant was in the White House a woman named Thurstan came to him with a deed on parchment for the entire State of Maine. She wanted him to accept it in trust for the people, and pay her an annuity in consideration thereof. Subsequently she made a similar application in reference to a like paper which proved her title in fee to the whole United States. In return she demanded an allowance of $300,000 per annum. Since March 4 last she has been seeking an interview with Mr. Cleveland. She owns all Europe now, and is anxious to hypothecate the property.

The New Chinese Minister at Washington an Exalted Noble in His Own Land.

In many respects Yang Yee, the new Chinese minister, is one of the most interesting men to arrive in Washington in many a day. He is a man of great wealth and the highest position in China—a man of such importance, in fact, that he comes very near being a royal personage. About 50 years of age, short and stout, he moves with an air of self-possession characteristic of the high-bred Chinese. The minister's wife, who is accompanied by her two daughters and five Oriental ladies of rank, is said by the Star to be decidedly exclusive, and will not be much seen in Washington society. In accordance with Chinese custom she lives a life of the greatest seclusion, dining alone and seeing no one, for visitors are not permitted to enter her apartments.

FLEETS OF THE DESERT.

Means of Commercial Intercourse in Asia and Africa.

If the camel is the ship of the desert, the caravan is its fleet and the camel drivers are its navigators. Camels, on account of their powers of endurance, are the means of commercial intercourse in many parts of Asia and Africa, and have been so used from the earliest period. A caravan is merely an organized company of travelers formed for the purpose of mutual protection. All caravans are under the command of a chief, and the members are subjected to discipline. Formerly caravans were frequently plundered by organized bands of robbers and desert dwellers, and even yet tribute is often laid by wandering Bedouins upon caravans passing through the African desert. Drivers are usually selected from men remarkable for their endurance, hardihood, and courage. At present in Africa Bedouins monopolize the business, being naturally fitted for it owing to their wild, roving lives in the desert.

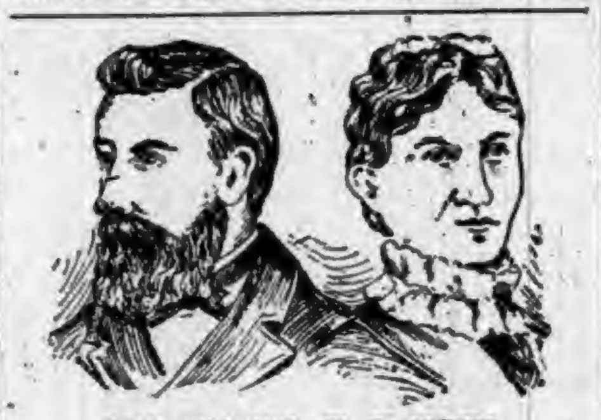
A Prisoner Expires When Told He Had Secured a New Trial.

The death of William F. Pettit, at the Michigan City penitentiary, just after he had received word that the Supreme Court had granted him a new trial, ended one of the most sensational and interest-absorbing cases ever brought to trial in Indiana. The crime for which Pettit was tried and convicted was the murder of his wife in July, 1889. She died under certain suspicious circumstances. Four months after the burial her body was exhumed. Enough strychnine was found in the stomach to cause death. Pettit was arrested, charged with the murder, and shortly after a Mrs. Whitehead, with whom he had been on intimate terms, was also taken into custody. The latter was shortly afterward released, but Pettit was found guilty on strong circumstantial evidence. He was sent to the penitentiary for a life imprisonment, but all along protested his innocence and believed that some day he would be given a new trial. He made strenuous efforts to secure one, but was unsuccessful until recently. His health had been very poor of late and in his weakened condition the joy at having a new trial brought his death. Mr. Pettit was at one time in his career a minister and took much interest in church work.



REV. AND MRS. W. F. PETTIT.

Long Has She Reigned.

Queen Victoria has now passed the record of Henry III., who ruled fifty-six years and twenty-nine days, and has reigned longer than any English sovereign save George III., who ruled from Oct. 25, 1760, to Jan. 29, 1820 a period of fifty-nine years and ninety-seven days; and she may live to equal that.

THE man who makes the most noise in a quarrel is usually believed to be in the right.—Atchison Globe.

Self-Contained Electric Locomotives.

The new plan for railroads brought forward in France is the subject of much comment. The system aims to combine the features of greatest value in electric and steam motors for railway lines—a system which, as claimed in the account given, can be adopted anywhere without change of track or rolling stock. The electric current is to drive the wheels, but is not to be conveyed from stationary machines along the line, and is generated on the train, the locomotive being simply a traveling electric plant. A steam engine at the rear of the locomotive works the generating dynamo, this furnishing current to a small motor placed on each axle of the locomotive, and, also, when it is desirable to extend the system further, to a motor on each axle of the cars. The absurdity of converting the steam into electricity before using the power is declared to be only apparent; and the double loss in thus using the energy of the fuel is more than offset by the gain in applying rotary power direct to the axles, avoiding slipping of the rails, and making unnecessary the connecting rods, cranks and wheels, whose jar and friction absorb a great part of the motive force. The new locomotive is said to give exact regulation of power and an increase of speed per hour, fifty-six to sixty-two miles, without change of roadbed.

Diplomatist and Caterer's Tout.

A frequenter of one of the leading clubs of the capital, a member of the diplomatic corps and a financier by natural instinct, augments his salary by acting as a medium between his fashionable friends and the tradespeople of his acquaintance. The diplomat has established himself in this business, which for several years has been profitable alike to himself, the caterers and the florists. At the beginning of each season he enters into a formal agreement with several of the leading caterers and confectioners to use his social influence in obtaining for them the custom of the wealthy contingent of his acquaintance in whom ball-giving propensities are likely to develop. On all orders received a heavy percentage is exacted.—Washington.

All Day at the Desk.

Even in the strongest constitutions the stock of vitality is not inexhaustible. All day at the desk, without a due modicum of out-of-door exercise, is calculated to pump the inherent vigor out of a healthy man or woman with as much certainty as water is pumped out of a ship's hold by a donkey engine. Application to business is praiseworthy, of course, but this may be overdone. Expand your lungs, stretch your limbs with vigorous exercise occasionally, and above all, if you find that overwork has made inroads upon health, try a course of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which stimulates digestion and regulates the bowels, liver and system generally. It is the king of tonics, and possess qualities which, say physicians, commend it to the use of invalids in general. Beneficial in malarial, rheumatic, kidney and nervous complaints.

Kindness.

In the intercourse of social life, it is by little acts of watchful kindness recurring daily and hourly—and opportunities of doing kindnesses if sought for are forever starting up—it is by words, by tones, by gestures, by looks, that affection is won and preserved. He who neglects these trifles, yet boasts that, whenever a great sacrifice is called for, he shall be ready to make it, will rarely be loved. The likelihood is, he will not make it; and if he does, it will be rather for his own sake than for his neighbor's.—Sala.

Knowledge.

Men have entered into a desire of learning and knowledge sometimes upon a natural curiosity and inquisitive appetite; sometimes to entertain their minds with variety and delight; sometimes for ornament and reputation; sometimes to enable them to obtain the victory of wit and contradiction, and sometimes for lucre and possession; but seldom sincerely to give a true account of their gift or reason for the benefit and use of man, as if they were sought in knowledge a couch whereupon to rest a searching and restless spirit or a terrace for a wandering and variable mind, to walk up and down with a fair prospect, or a tower of state for a proud mind to raise itself upon, or a fort on commanding ground for strife or contention, or a shop for profit and sale, and not a rich storehouse for the glory of the Creator, and the relief of man's estate.—Bacon.

Life.

As the pleasures of the future will be spiritual and pure, the object of a good and wise man in this transitory state of existence, should be to fit himself for a better by controlling the unworthy propensities of his nature and improving all his better aspirations, to do his duty first to God, then to his neighbor, to promote the happiness and welfare of those who are in any degree dependent upon him, or whom he has the means of assisting, never wantonly to injure the meanest thing that lives, to encourage, as far as he may have the power, whatever is useful and tends to refine and exalt humanity, to store his mind with such knowledge as it is fitted to receive and he is able to attain; and so to employ the talents committed to his care that when the account is required, he may hope to have his stewardship approved.—Southey.

Express Cars Guarded in Maine.

A strange sight in these days of peace is that witnessed on the Pullman trains east or west from Waterville. When the train comes to a stop a man appears from the baggage car with a Winchester repeating rifle in his hand and takes a tour of the express car. He looks under, over and on top of it, to make sure there is no one seeking to make entrance to the American Express Company's valuable freight. This man with the rifle is not its only guard. There are two men in the car with the most improved Smith & Wesson revolvers in a belt, which they are obliged to wear upon duty.—Lewiston Journal.

Surprise in a Cyclone Pit.

Some years ago, in 1883-4, quite a number of persons dug "cyclone pits" near their houses. Luckily, they have had no occasion to use these. Near Louisburg, Jack Adams has one of these pits, and a few days ago, thinking a cyclone was approaching, he sent his wife and children into the pit. A highland moccasin, a very poisonous snake, had his home in the pit and bit one of the children. Prompt and liberal doses of whisky saved the child's life.—Raleigh (N. C.) News.

"POINTS" in the stock market are probably so called because speculators generally get stuck on them.

A Maine Hermit.

A Waterville hermit gets well down to the limit of subsistence for he lives on mush and molasses almost exclusively. He cooks his mush in a big kettle and his method is the beau ideal of simplicity. Gradually layers of mush harden and stick to the kettle's sides. Succeeding accretions at last nearly fill the cavity and then the hermit has a festal day of purification. He cants the kettle over the fire and "burns her out." Then we're ready for more of the dietary mush. China Hermit Goddard also cooked all of his curious compounds in a kettle, but he kept it passably clean. The China hermit, however, wore no pants unless on strictly dress occasions, and therefore stands the unique and unapproachable even by the Waterville misanthrope of mush, molasses, and moody mortification.—Lewiston Journal.

Falcons Better Than Homing Pigeons.

The experiments of Colonel Smoilon of the Russian army, with falcons as carriers of dispatches have proved successful and the Russian army hereafter will employ them in preference to the ordinary "homing" birds. The Colonel has found that the falcon can carry 1,640 grams without diminishing its rate of speed, which is considerable greater than that of the pigeon. The falcons, he says, are less likely to fall prey to other birds, as they are better fighters than the pigeons. It is on record, according to the officer, that a falcon once flew from the Canary Islands to the estates of the Duke of Larma, Spain. It seems highly probable that the falcon will become the servant of other European armies.—New York Tribune.

The Number 13 a Good Omen.

In Judaism, as shown by Dr. Goldfahn, the number thirteen is a symbol of good omen. For instance, the mercy of God is promised in thirteen expressions, thirteen young steers were sacrificed on the first day Sukkoth, thirteen years is the age of religious majority, Mainmonides wrote thirteen articles of belief. According to the Mishpah, in the sanctuary in Jerusalem there were thirteen money boxes, thirteen horns of plenty, thirteen tables, thirteen prostrations. Friday, too, in Judaism is not unlucky. On Friday man was created and blessed by God. Hence the Talmud calls Friday a day of blessing.

The Handwriting on the Wall.

It would probably surprise the American manufacturer to look through the London city directory and see the names enrolled there of American firms who are represented here. The Englishman is the most conservative man on earth; however, they are gradually realizing that America is already king in much which she produces; and we believe, although of course they will not own it, that right down in the bottom of their hearts they see the time is coming and not far distant when America, from a commercial stand point, will be the all-supreme power on earth.—Hardware.

The way in which the ages of these trees have been ascertained leaves no doubt of its correctness—New York Times.

Some Reminiscences of Its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

The finances of Auburn in 1874 were as they now are, a matter of grave local importance in their influence upon the town's credit and the means of ability to make improvements. A consolidated statement for the fiscal year ending May 1, presented the following suggestive summary of indebtedness:

Salaries, $113.16; sidewalk crossings, $677.68; street work, $253.31; surveying, $111.00; ditches and gutters, $751.57; marshal's tax fees, $118.19; other items, $482.32. Total allowances, $2,507.19. Bonds for school grounds, $2,500, and outstanding town orders dating back through four years, $1,865.00.

This expenditure was heavy and without precedent in the history of the town, but there were those who deemed improvements imperative regardless of increasing debt and shortened credit.

From and before its incorporation, Auburn has never been out of debt. In common with most towns and cities, the demands upon her treasury have ever exceeded ability to provide ready means of payment. Issues of orders and bonds have been a common and costly expedient and a check upon progress. In 1874, the credit of the town had fallen very low and the commercial value of municipal warrants was but eighty per cent of their face value. To compensate for this perilous approach to insolvency, there was little to show. No enterprise had been perfected and no solid gains were apparent.

The report was a relief, for there had been neglect in publication of the condition of the treasury and rumor had grossly exaggerated the amount of orders outstanding and "not paid for want of funds."

It had been well if, like Patrick Henry, we could have been guided by the light of experience and judged the future by the past, but popular desire, skillfully gratified, has illuminated silent streets during hours of sleep to be paid at the price of ever increasing and oppressive taxation.

The town marshal of that day set an example which, for some reason, has not been emulated by his successors, in making a report which, with the town's great increase of population, shows the opportunity offered for private peculation where no charges are made and no accounting rendered. An honest marshal would not object and a dishonest one dare not, to a strict accountability for his employment of men working poll tax. The report in question gave 180 polls worked, 6 exempts and taxes collected, $1,437.51; sidewalks, $77.96; licenses, $43.75. Total collections, $1,559.22.

In Auburn and DeKalb county, as well as throughout the country, a monetary stringency similar to, but not as formidable as that of 1893, prevailed and the demand for funds was felt from town centers to the isolated farm house. Barely an approximate idea of popular necessity may be suggested by brief reference to the annual report of the county recorder. That official had placed upon his books a record of real estate mortgages amounting to $376,531.60. During the year, $163,325.00 had been paid and the remainder had gone to swell the huge aggregate of individual indebtedness previously existing. Chattel mortgages became noticeable and reached the sum of $13,875. Mechanic's liens amounted to $2,612.00, and, as showing activity in real estate, voluntary transfers had been made to the extent of $800,000.00.

For comparison, we present an extract from the report of Samuel Williams, present recorder, to the state statistician for the year ending May 31, 1893. It is a large showing and is as follows: The number of deeds of all kinds recorded was 860, for which the consideration was $768,866.00, and the total of mortgages was 1,039, for which $485,777.00 was given.

The writer hoped to be able to state the present indebtedness of the "people" of the county, but found the task too difficult, but some idea of its extent may be surmised in the fact that $100,000.00 is owing on 6 per cent school funds and another $100,000.00, all payable in gold coin, to a single capitalist.

During a very brief period of this year (1874), the county was out of debt and all claims were paid on presentation of orders. Nicholas Ensley was the treasurer fortunate enough in being the official at this exceptional time. The occasion was deemed opportune to bring forward the subject of providing a new jail in consonance with the needs and progress of the community.

To this end, the commissioners met in special session Oct. 20, to inspect plans submitted by T. J. Tolan, of Delphos, O. These plans, in style and convenience, exterior and interior, were regarded as possessing superior merit and found favor with the board.

It is to be remarked that the building of the jail and the sheriff's residence therewith connected, from the plan and provision of means to its completion and acceptance, was consummated strictly on contract lines and without unnecessary expense.

The residence part was planned to be 38 by 47 feet, two stories high, of brick upon stone wall and to be crowned by a mansard roof. The jail was to be 33 by 42 feet, 28 feet high. It was to contain fourteen cells in two tiers, with four distinct departments. There was to be an apparatus for opening and closing cells without need of entering the jail. The building was to be heated by steam and was to cost $30,000.00.

It was not intended to do more than advertise and let the contract before the spring of 1875, although much of the material could be placed upon the ground during the winter and the work was expected to be finished by Oct. 1, '75.

In the only printed report seen by the writer of the names and ages of inmates of the County Asylum, there appear the names of Nancy Craig aged 23, Chauncey Coburn, 45, and Frederick Shaffer, 50. The last named died in '92 and the others are all that remain a score of years later of twenty-two unfortunates who, in 1874, were a public charge.

They have seen Miller, Wyatt, Pattee, Rummel, Glazier and Bartels come and go, while they have become familiar with and grown old in the poor house. It seems a hard fate that the sole provision made by law for people who are worn out by sickness or a life of labor, should be to assort them with the lunatic and idiotic and thus bring such shame upon them that it is to the sensitive as terrible as death.

Prudence Ritter, aged, mild, in tone and demeanor, a lady, might stand for "Mother at the Poorhouse." The years pass without complaint or leave of absence, and resignation to rigid necessity, but no son returning from Colorado's mines has she to take her back to her earlier home in the pleasant and beautiful fields of old Virginia. She, like others, will by and by drop off, unnoticed and unknown, "only a pauper whom nobody owns."

The vote of DeKalb county at the election held Oct. 13, 1874, presented the not infrequent anomaly of republican success in the face of a democratic majority of electors. Taking the vote as cast for the office of Secretary of State as a criterion of party strength, the democratic majority in the county was 62.

The vote on county ticket, republican candidates first named, was as follows:

FOR REPRESENTATIVE.
John Taylor	1,960
Miles Waterman	1,961
FOR CLERK.
George H. K. Moss	2,039
Lewis D. Britton	1,884
FOR SHERIFF.
William L. Meese	2,283
John Treesh	1,612
FOR AUDITOR.
Isaac Hague	2,089
Wm. McIntyre	1,813
FOR TREASURER.
N. Ensley	2,046
D. H. Murray	1,886
FOR COMMISSIONER.
Henry Hood	1,886
George H. Duncan	2,076

This summary is of interest in its presentation of popular preference rising above the strong grounds of common partisanship. The election of Mr. Waterman by a single, but not unchallenged, vote was a tribute to the high character of Mr. Taylor, as was that of Mr. Moss, a young and promising attorney at Butler, in his contest for the clerkship with so able and veteran an opponent as Mr. Britton.

Mr. Moss became a resident of Auburn, occupying the Hall property, now the home of his widow and her parents, and at once was recognized as a most desirable citizen. His business system applied to his new position was a convenience to all who had interests in this court.

Wm. L. Meese, during his first term, had developed a marvelous popularity as shown by his lead over Mr. Treesh, who was not thereby prevented from locating in Auburn, whose citizens utilized him successive terms as marshal and are largely indebted to his labor for the extent and perfection of their cement walks.

Mr. Meese, at the conclusion of his term, blended ministerial with other labors and is an ever welcome guest at marriage festivities and the trusty friend of the sorrowful in the presence of the dread visitor.

No dissatisfaction with the conduct of the office defeated Mr. McIntyre, but the potent operation of an unwritten law prescribing four years as the term limit for an incumbent of the lucrative position of Auditor.

Isaac Hague, who has been in public life more or less since his term as auditor, illustrated family succession to the same office his father had held in the earliar history of the county. On expiration of term he took an interest in the First National Bank, and identified himself as a citizen and business man with the fortunes of the town.

The election of Mr. Ensley over Mr. Murray who was in all respects unexceptional and most capable, was a high compliment to his unsurpassed conduct of the county treasury. Holding public office to be a public trust, he never hesitated on occasion to pay out the last dollar to redeem an order, and his funding of jail bonds was marked by such sound business principles as have been illustrated in a striking degree in the swift and accurate disbursement of millions of dollars in pensions to the invalid veterans of the civil war.

The immediate and remote results of this election have been of lasting benefit to Auburn in the accession of valuable townsmen, whose personal standing and business activity have reflected credit upon themselves and the municipality.

The town election held in May went democratic by an average majority of thirty-four. This revulsion of sentiment was partly caused by dissatisfaction with expenditure and growing indebtedness and by a desire for a change that might be for the better. The new trustees were J. Walborn, F. D. Ryan, T. D. Gross, E. E. Williams and D. Z. Hoffman. F. E. Davenport was chosen clerk, J. R. Lenning, treasurer and W. Baughn, assessor.

A public spirited but fruitless effort had been made by the former board to provide for the town some protection against fire. Early in February, John L. Davis and Joseph W. McKay, members of the board, were sent as a committee to Laporte, Indiana, to see about the purchase of a fire engine and a hose cart. They brought back a favorable report, having found a hand engine in good, serviceable condition and a hose cart, one of the finest in the country. The proposition to buy this outfit was brought before the public, since the names of property holders representing five-eighths of the valuation of town property, was a legal requirement to a petiton asking a special fire tax of 25c. per $100 for two years with which to pay for the purchase.

Although the entire expense of engine, cart and five hundred ten feet of hose would have been but $1,200, neither economy nor prudence were considered; trifling objections were raised, such as that some localities, notably Main street, would be especially advantaged and, strange to say, the petition lacked the requisite number of signatures and, unfortunately for the best interests of Auburn, the opportunity was allowed to pass unimproved.

A Friendly Answer.

Our old veteran friend Thomas Chandler sent in his regular subscription last week and cheerful words therewith. For one afflicted as he is, he is always surprisingly cheerful. He very naturally asks us how we like the election, for our friend is a staunch republican. Well, as to the election, friend Thomas, it was no surprise to us. We could see the storm coming, and even as a democrat, we believe the sweeping republican victory will result in good, for it will benefit the democracy, the party in power, and to which the people must now look for such relief as may be had from wiser laws. No, we do not think that "what we need is tariff and protection." Tariff perhaps, we must have, in some shape, for we need money to carry on the government. But we do not believe in a tariff so arranged as to have "protection" for its main object. Protection may help a few persons who are "protected," but all the millions who buy their products must contribute to this prosperity. We do not suppose there is a man in Noble or DeKalb counties who is benefited by protection. Yet it costs every man, woman and child in the two counties quite a sum of money yearly to help make these "protected" people rich. But we don't believe in the plan. We do not believe the country and the people are as well off to-day as they would have been had there been no "protective tariff." A man has no right to ask me to pay out my money to "protect" him. The government has no right to compel me to do it. "Protected" industries would to-day be on a better footing than they are, if they had not sat down and waited for laws that would enable them to charge a higher price. No young man ever gained strength and success by sitting down and asking his father to help him, year in and year out. But that is just what the "protected" industries have been doing.

A YOUNG GIRL'S FORTUNE.

AN INTERESTING SKETCH.

Nothing appeals so strongly to a mother's affection as her daughter just budding into womanhood. Following is an instance: "Our daughter, Blanche, now 15 years of age, had been terribly afflicted with nervousness, and had lost the entire use of her right arm. She was in such a condition that we had to keep her from school and abandon her music lessons. In fact, we feared St. Vitus dance, and are positive but for an invaluable remedy she would have had that terrible affliction. We had employed physicians, but she received no benefit from them. The first of last August she weighed but 75 pounds, and although she has taken only three bottles of Nervine she now weighs 106 pounds; her nervousness and symptoms of St. Vitus dance are entirely gone, she attends school regularly, and studies with comfort and ease. She has recovered complete use of her arm, her appetite is splendid, and no money could procure for our daughter the health Dr. Miles' Nervine has brought her.

When my brother recommended the remedy I had no faith in patent medicines, and would not listen to him, but as a last resort he sent us a bottle, we began giving it to Blanche, and the effect was almost immediate."—Mrs. R. R. Bullock, Brighton, N. Y.

Paying Premiums at Fairs.

The Lagrange Democrat is pleading with the managers of their fair not to cut down the premiums earned by exhibitors but pay in full, though it may be necessary to borrow money to do this. That is right. A fair must pay its premiums in full, no matter what it costs. We know that the Waterloo fair has borrowed several times to do this, but it has kept up the credit of the association. All who ever exhibited there for the past twenty-two years, have had their premiums, if any were awarded to them.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Some Reminiscences of its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1874—CONTINUED.

For the first time in her history, what is known as a "write up" was published in a number of the COURIER. Its mercenary and partial character detracted largely from its value. The eulogistic terms employed in expressing paid-for flattery were more injurious than useful, and a scrutiny of the fulsome matter, reveals its worthlessness.

Such business as Auburn had was still in a flourishing condition. The hub and spoke factory employed twenty-five men and turned out eighty sets of hubs and seven thousand spokes daily. Their pay roll amounted to $900 a day. John Casebeer was its superintendent, E. E. Williams, purchaser of material, and Ira Crow, engineer.

The stave factory worked thirty-five hands, required 5,000 cords of bolts for a year's stock, had on hand over one million staves, paid out in a single day $1150, and found ready sale at handsome profit for all its products. Theron Clark had recovered from his loss by fire and was operating a fine saw mill in the low ground east of Eagle Mills to good advantage.

Conscious of power if united and impatient of the subordinate position assigned them in the matter of produce sales and supply purchases, the farmers throughout the country began to organize what has since been familiarly known as the Grange movement.

The growth was wonderful and the enthusiasm was unbounded. The movement spread like wildfire. Granges were formed in every township, councils in each county, and were given direction and force by State and National Granges.

Interest was increased by gatherings, where oratory was succeeded by abundant refreshments of food; and entire families gave the day to enjoyment with the deeper object of consolidating their power. Middlemen were deemed superfluous and steps were taken by appointment of purchasing agents and stocking of grange stores, to buy supplies at approximate wholesale prices.

Along in February, 1874, the impulse made itself known in DeKalb county. On the 17th, a grange was constituted at the Husselman school house with R. N. Crooks, Master; S. Kutzner, Secretary; W. Lessig, Overseer; C. W. Scattergood, Lecturer; J. C. St. Clair, Treasurer, R. S. S. Reed, Steward and Mrs. Reed, Assistant Steward.

Smithfield farmers organized on the 10th, electing F. Kelley, M.; E. R. Shoemaker, Ass't. M.; S. B. Mottinger, Sec.; J. Hemstreet, Lecturer, and Henry Hood Treasurer. Four days later, Jackson Grange was formed with John Cool, M.; Jas. McClellan, Ass't. M; J. G. Lawhead, Sec, and M. Owens, Treas. In as rapid succession, others followed, till the territory was fully occupied.

A county council of Patrons of Husbandry was organized May 8th in Grangers' Hall, Waterloo, by delegates from subordinate granges. At this council, R. N. Crooks was chosen president; Ephraim Boyle, vice-pres.; M. Waterman, sec.; F. Kelley, treas., and J. G. Lawhead, door-keeper. The board of trustees was A. D. Moore, John Lowe and Hugh Nelson. Messrs. Reed, Moore and Shoemaker were appointed a committee to elect a purchasing agent, and the objects of the order were stated to be the welfare of the farmer and to "bring producer and consumer together to the exclusion of the middleman."

A grand picnic gathering was held at Auburn in September at which a procession a mile long paraded through the town. It was led by the Hicksville band and represented all lodges in the county. Exercises were held in the bottom east of town and the principal speaker was James Buchanan, of Indianapolis.

The upheaval, like a phenominal tidal wave, rose and fell and the granges soon stranded, went out of existence after a brief but brilliant and suggestive career. It taught farmers their strength and encouraged them to persevere till again, in 1892, as populists, their political strength was displayed in formidable gatherings at the countyseat and a fairly strong vote at the following election.

During this same year, another movement, known as the Women's Crusade, swept over the land. It was directed against the saloon. At Waterloo, prominent ladies took an active part to good purpose, and in Auburn, a temperance league was formed during the spring, not for the purpose of visiting the saloons to induce their closure, but to combine influence against traffic in liquors. No demonstrations were made, although licenses were got with difficulty. While popular antipathy to the saloon has deepened and extended and screened windows proclaim them under a ban, yet temperance people of Auburn have become disheartened and the saloons of the town give the Keeley Institute more reformative work than it can well accomplish.

There was, as yet, no bank in Auburn, but the time had arrived when such an institution had become a necessity. There were citizens willing and with capital enough to engage in banking, but they had no experience, and, distrusting their own ability, they invited the coming of some one to take the initiative.

On March 2, two men named Riley and Mots from Wabash visited Auburn to look over the ground preparatory to establishing a bank. The need was evident of a medium to facilitate business transactions and by secured deposits to find employment for otherwise idle currency. They met several citizens at the Swineford House, to whom they expressed themselves well pleased with the location and their proposals met unqualified encouragement.

All seemed favorable and the front part of the Cool building was engaged for an office. It was intended to commence business within a month with a capital of $50,000, of which Auburn people were to have furnished two-fifths. Nothing was done and, save several futile assurances, the subject lapsed till near the close of the year, when George Hazzard, a stranger from New Castle, this state, made his appearance and, renewing the subject of a bank, speedily won the confidence of our people.

He proposed to open a bank here with a capital of 50,000, to which he asked citizens to subscribe stock to the amount of $15.000. This was promptly taken and arrangements were made to bring about a speedy organization. The question was debated whether the institution should be known as State or National. The latter was supposed to be most profitable to stockholders, but the former was most favorably regarded by the people.

The decision was in favor of a National bank, and on Dec. 19, 1874, the First National Bank of Auburn, Indiana, was organized by electing a board of directors consisting of Nicholas Ensley, Wm. McIntyre and Orrin C. Clark, of Auburn, and George and James Hazzard, of New Castle.

A small framed building on Seventh street just west of the present Farmers Bank block was occupied; a ponderous and strong safe was procured and put in place and James V. Hazzard, the younger of the brothers, was installed as cashier. Deposits were at once received. United States bonds were purchased and deposited in the National treasury. Sheets of crisp new national bank notes in denomination of fives arrived from Washington and being signed, their issue commenced and business opened auspiciously. The Hazzards enjoyed the fullest confidence of our people and were regarded as benefactors to the town. The entire community as a matter of pride and convenience rejoiced that, at last, banking facilities and accommodation could be had at home.

The important subject of education began to attract especial attention from the rapid increase in population which required additional facilities for the accommodation of the large number of children which at the fall term crowded the schools and overtaxed the teachers. A hundred children were assembled in a single room and it was decided that something should be done the coming year towards the erection of a commodious substantial school building.

The first and most imdortant preliminary was the acquisition of ample and convenient school grounds, central of location, yet sufficiently remote from intrusion as not to disturb residents nor be inconvenienced by street traffic. These essentials were happily found in what was known as the Eldridge lot that contained five acres and was to be had for $2,000, cash. To provide this sum, the town board by ordinance duly published offered school bonds to the amount of $2,500.

As a like emergency in the way of providing accommodations for the constant increase of school going population has again and recently necessitated the issue of school bonds, it is interesting to note the changed and improved conditions attendant upon the later issue as compared with that of 1874. Then, as now, a financial panic prevailed, but monetary depression and stringency did not defeat the plans of the town board nor furnish excuse for driving a hard bargain.

It had been said that a sinking fund should have anticipated present need, but the emergency would not admit of delay and the means were the most judicious possible to attain the money required for building.

In 1874, the town board authorized the issue of eleven bonds of $200 each, and one of $300, the last to fall due April 1, 1877. The rate of interest was 10 per cent, paid annually. It was provided that they should not be sold for less than 94 cents on the $1 00. They were sold at a discount of 5 per cent, and the proceeds, $2,375, were turned over to the school board, and $2,000, applied in payment for the school lot. The time till redemption was short and this debt was soon extinguished.

The recent issue of $10,000 school house bonds, bearing interest at 6 per cent per annum and payable $1,000 each year commencing at July 10, 1898, was sold without discount or commission. They are made payable at the First National Bank of Auburn in whatever currency is current when due. The former sale was ruinous to the town; the latter is in all respects creditable and advantageous.

The school grounds having been acquired, although without the limits of the corporation, the admirable site was planted in shade trees and this wise provision for the future now serves to handsomely embellish the grounds and affords pleasant shade for school children.

The authorities having gone thus far, the subject of a new building was broached and it was decided that when the time should come in the near future, a structure should be erected that would "meet all the demands of the place for many years to come."

An important change of text books to secure uniformity was brought about by action of the County Board of Education. The well-known Ray's Arithmetics gave way to French; Cutter's Physiology to Brown's; Harper's Scott's History to Anderson's, and this innovation, not always for the better as to text material, has continued at intervals to this date.

The manifest errors of compilation, the omission of important matter and the crude construction, called for a revision or for other works. The former was decided upon, and Mrs. Campbell, wife of the Dispatch editor, a lady of acknowledged ability, has been assigned to and entered upon the task of revising the readers.

Albert Totten having left Auburn, his place on the school board was supplied by J. R. Rickel, and on August 17, the corps of teachers consisting of A. Hoffman, Mary Schoonover, Mary McNerny, Frank Stahl, Mattie Miller and Hattie Griswold, were re-engaged for the fall term at reduced wages. The per diem of the Principal became $1 45, of the Grammar and Intermediate teachers, $2.25 each, and of the Primary, $1.75 each.

A growing spirit of liberality in the compensation of Principals has been a feature of Auburn school boards. The progressive increase of wages supposably proportioned to greater numbers and responsibilities is shown as follows:

Monthly salary of J. H. Moore, $40; C. P. Hodge, $50; Spencer Dills, $65; W. H. McIntosh, $80; A. R. Hoffman, $100; Michael Seiler, $116, and Lida A. Powers, $125.

The close of the term showed an attendance in the High School of 40, with an average of but 23. The High School branches proved a costly feature, inasmuch as but six studied Latin and one Trigonometry. It is a question in the minds of many whether a revision of grade studies should not be had, to eliminate such as are pursued by few, and by these to little advantage, and to substitute others designed to so perfect knowledge in the common branches as to make them available in after life.

The custom of hiring by terms was yet in vogue, but an advance had been made in permanence, by successive contracts with the same teachers whose success and harmonious co operation were increased by experience.

(To be continued next week.)

The Great Through Car Line.

It is a well established fact that the North-Western Line (Chicago and North-Western R'y) in its equipment and train service, its general facilities for the accomodation of all classes of travel, and its methods of looking after the comfort and welfare of its patrons takes rank with the leading railways of the world.

Its through car lines extend from Chicago to St. Paul and Minneapolis, the "Twin Cities of the Northwest;" to Duluth, the Superiors, Ashland, Marquette, and the wonderful iron and copper regions of northern Wisconsin and Michigan; to Winona, Pierre, and the rich agricultural sections of Minnesota and the Dakotas; to Des Moines, Sioux City, Council Bluffs, Omaha, Lincoln, the prosperous and growing cities of Iowa and Nebraska; to Deadwood, the Dakota Hot Springs, and the famous mining districts of the Black Hills; to Denver, Salt Lake and the health resorts of Colorado and Utah; to San Francisco, Cal.; Portland, Oregon, and Pacific Coast and Puget Sound points.

The perfectly equipped vestibuled trains of the North-Western Line convey the traveler comfortably, safely and quickly to nearly every part of the West and Northwest, and while one may travel surrounded by all the luxuries afforded by an equipment of magnificent sleeping cars, buffet, smoking and library cars, compartment sleeping cars, and superb dining cars, the comfort and convenience of passengers desiring to travel at small expense is promoted by the provision of accomodations for their use in Tourist Sleeping cars, Free Reclining Chair cars and commodious day coaches.

In a word, if you contemplate a trip to almost any portion of the West and Northwest, your ticket should read via the North-Western Line. Maps, time tables and general information can be obtained of ticket agents in the United States and Canada, or by addressing W. A. EVENTS OF INTEREST

THAT OCCURRED DURING THE PAST WEEK.

An Infernal Machine Sent to Chancellor Von Caprivi—A Double Tragedy at Ridgeville, Ohio—A Circus Train Wrecked—Lehigh Valley Strikers Growing Violent.

TO BLOW UP CAPRIVI.

A Frenchman Ships an Infernal Machine to the German Statesman.

Berlin special: Chancellor Von Caprivi received a small wooden box from Orleans, France. It was handed to the Chancellor's aide-de-camp, Maj. Ebmeyer, who, becoming suspicious, examined the box and found it an infernal machine. The box was six inches long, two wide, and two deep. A letter accompanying it informed the Chancellor that the box contained a sample of a remarkable kind of turnip seed.

The letter accompanying it was in French. It was written apparently by an illiterate person, as the penmanship was bad and several words were spelled incorrectly. The sender evidently was aware that the Chancellor's hobby was gardening.

If Colonel Ebmeyer had not seen the powder leaking out, the box would have exploded when forced open, as the mechanism was perfectly arranged. The President of the Police, who was called at once to the Chancellor, wanted to keep the matter quiet lest other enemies of the Chancellor might be encouraged to make attempts on his life. Caprivi, however, refused to let him do so. The Chancellor said he wished the country to know the facts. No clue to the identity of the sender of the box had been obtained.

Strikers Growing Violent.

Wilkesbarre (Pa.) special: Violence is reported all along the line of the Lehigh Valley road. At Sugar Notch a mob attacked the station and drove the non-union men from the premises. The men have abandoned work. Burgess Shields of Sugar Notch, has notified Sheriff Waters that he is not in a position to preserve the peace. The Sheriff will send deputies to the town. The telegraphers between this city and White Haven have received threatening letters. Sheriff Waters swore in fifty deputies and stationed them in the Coxton yards. At Pittston a non-union brakeman was struck in the head with a stone and knocked from the train. The company and authorities have sent a number of telegrams to Governor Pattison urging that troops be called out.

Frightful Wreck.

Freight train No. 65, east-bound, on the Baltimore and Ohio road, was derailed by an axle breaking on a car on a bridge near Hyndman, Pa. The bridge was completely torn down and fifteen cars were precipitated to the creek below. Seven tramps were seen on the train just before the accident occurred, but have not been seen since, and are supposed to be under the wrecked cars in the creek. The cars were all loaded with coal.

A Terrible Double Tragedy.

A tragedy occurred in Ridgeville, Ohio, the other night. Herman Barrows, a respected farmer, aged 68, shot his wife, aged 30, in the breast and head. He then placed the revolver to his head and sent a bullet through his brain, dying instantly. Barrows is a Justice of the Peace, and has been a prominent man in the county for years. Mr. Barrows may recover. A petty quarrel between the couple prompted the terrible deed.

Children Burned to Death.

Mrs. George Buckingham of Hanover, Ohio, left her three children alone in a closed room to call upon neighbors. Returning, she found Bertha, aged 5, burned to death, and the other two lying semi-conscious on the floor on account of the smoke. The children had played with the grate fire.

Circus Train Wrecked.

By the breaking of an axle, one of the cars in the circus train of Sells & Rentfrow jumped the track near Amelia, Texas, on the Southern Pacific. The car contained wagons and tent stuff in which a number of men were sleeping. Five persons were seriously injured.

Powderly's Resignation.

T. V. Powderly's resignation as Grand Master Workman of the Knights of Labor has been accepted, J. H. Sovereign of Iowa, was elected to succeed him and an entirely new executive board was chosen.

Spain's Consul.

The State Department has recognized temporarily Don Luiz Munzi as Acting Consul of Spain at Baltimore in place of Don Carlos Diaz, who recently committed suicide.

Aged Ohio Man Killed by Cars.

William Griffith, a wealthy farmer, aged about 68, was killed by the cars while walking from Shreve, Ohio, to his home, a short distance from that village. His body was found beside the track.

Beyond Control.

The gas well drilled on the farm of Charles Gibbs, five miles northeast of Greenfield, Ind., got beyond control and tore up everything in sight.

A Singular Accident.

A singular and what might have proved a fatal accident occurred to Mrs. George Grimm, five miles north of Wabash, Ind. About dusk she, with her sister, went to the barn to milk and became separated. Mrs. Grimm doing the milking near a large pile of straw. While thus engaged a huge mass of straw slid off the pile and completely buried her She was missed by her sister, who began an unsuccessful search, and at last summoned Mr. Grimm, who found his wife unconscious and nearly dead under the straw. Her body was bent nearly double, her throat upon the milk pail. Five minutes more in that position and she would have been dead, and it required considerable time and labor to resuscitate her.

A FIERCE FIRE.

Hotels and Theaters at Columbus, Ohio, Burn.

Fire broke out in the new Henrietta Theater, corner Spring and Front streets, Columbus, Ohio, and in less than an hour and a half this elegant play house, the Chittenden Hotel and Auditorium and Park theaters were in ruins. Felix Morris in the "Paper Chase," was at the Henrietta Theater and the orchestra had just finished the overture when the manager, Albert Ovens, appeared on the stage and informed the audience that there was a small blaze in the rear of the theater and suggested that they leave the theater. As no flames were to be seen and the audience was small, they did so in order. The members of the company were dressed for their parts, and as they were assured the theater was fire proof, made no effort to remove their wardrobes. In a few moments the flames, which first appeared in the large auditorium adjoining the theater, and which was unfinished, broke out in the rear of the stage. Almost instantly the whole proscenium was ablaze. The members of the company fled in their stage clothes. A high wind was blowing from the west and fanned the flames so that when the fire department arrived the theater was doomed and the Chittenden Hotel, adjoining on the east, was burning. A man who was recognized as Andrew Armstrong, a stage hand, and who worked about the scenery, appeared at a fourth story window of the theater and cried for help. He was told not to jump and he would be saved. He disappeared from the window and was not seen again.

The fire destroyed the whole square bounded by High, Spring, and Front streets and the first alley north of Spring street. It is not known how the fire originated, but it was probably from a defective flue in the theater. The total loss will be over $1,000,000.

LIKE SHEEP.

The Mexican Soldiers Were Slaughtered by the Rebels.

Deming (N. M.) special: Two Mexican refugees from the scene of the revolution say that a battle occurred in Poca Grande County the other day. The Mexican troops, numbering several hundred, were surrounded by the rebels in ambush and great slaughter resulted, the troops being utterly routed, and fled for their lives. The refugees state that the troops were marching from Cension when attacked by the rebels, who suddenly rushed upon them from all sides. The fighting continued all day. The rebels claim the victory. This report cannot be confirmed by other sources, as the scene is 200 miles from any telegraphic communication.

Later reports are to the effect that when the attack was made upon the troops the officers were shot down, causing a panic among the soldiers, who were killed like sheep. The battle resulted in a decisive victory for the rebels. The Yaqui Indians have joined the revolutionists. There is every reason to believe the correctness of the report.

BANGING AWAY.

The Insurgents are Confident of Success in Brazil.

A London Times dispatch from Rio De Janeiro, November 18, via Montevido, says: Heavy artillery fire continues daily. Forts Villegaignon and Lage are greatly battered. The heavy gun at Fort San Joao was struck by rebel shot and dismounted. During the bombardment a shell burst at Fort Lage, killing an officer and seventeen men. Parts of the city are perilous and owing to fusilade of rifles and machine guns, many casualties occur in the streets. Foreign diplomats consider it impossible to take further steps for the protection of life and property, and naval commanders concur in the general opinion, which favors letting both sides proceed without further interference. The insurgents are confident of success. They have captured Bage, in Rio Grande De Sul, and are making northward. President Peixotto is preparing for a stubborn defense of Rio De Janeiro and states that he intends fighting to the last and when the ships arrive he expects victory.

Fooled by a Freight.

Northern Indiana was the scene of another attempt to hold up a Lake Shore train. Ten men, armed with Winchester rifles, stopped a freight train at Elkhart, Ind., and robbed the crew. The freight was running on passenger train time, which was sixty minutes late, and this deceived the robbers who vented their anger on the helpless crew. The passenger train was only saved from the desperadors by being late. The news of the daring job spread rapidly and the neighborhood was aroused. The robbers are undoubtedly the parties who held up the Lake Shore train at Kessler last summer.

Fire Causes Great Loss.

Fire at Springfield, Mass., destroyed eight blocks, resulting in an estimated damage of $1,500,000. The burned district on Worthington street extends nearly 450 feet east from the rear of the Glendower House, and is nearly 150 feet deep. The seven blocks destroyed were as follows: Five-story brick block, owned by J. Weber, grocer; two brick blocks, five stories high, owned by J. K. Dexter & Co., rag dealers; five-story block, owned by John Doolan, also rag dealer; five-story block, owned by A. N. Mayo & Co., stock dealers; Gendower Hotel and Abbey Block and part of the Wright Block.

They Are Guilty.

Chicago special: The jury in the case against the officers of the Guarantee Investment Company, charged with using the mails for fraudulent purposes and conducting a lottery, returned a verdict of guilty against G. M. McDonald, President; William H. Stevenson, Treasurer and Vice-President, and Francis M. Swaeringer, Secretary. The case against J. B. Johnson, a director, was nolle prossed owing to a technical error in the indictment. Pending the hearing of a motion for a new trial the men were released on bail of $5,000 for McDonald and $1,000 each for the others.

Lake Steamer Abandoned.

Grand Haven (Mich.) special: Capt. J. Waltham and crew, of the schooner Wander of Chicago, have arrived here, having abandoned their vessel on the beach about three miles south of this harbor. She went on during a gale and after several hours of exposure and extreme suffering the crew managed to make the shore on portions of the wreck and through the assistance of the lifesaving crew. The Wander was loaded with staves and bound for Milwaukee.

Lucky Brakeman.

The Laporte County, Indiana, grand jury adjurned without returning an indictment against Bert Thompson. This action was contrary to the recommendation of the Coroner. Thompson is the Wabash freight brakeman who, September 22, caused the wreck at Kingsbury, in which twelve lives were lost. Thompson fled and was discovered living in Edgerton, Ohio. All the evidence threw the blame of the disaster on Thompson.

Shocked to Death.

Zephaniah Tibbetts, 20 years old, was killed in his father's saloon on Canal street, Grand Rapids, Mich., by an electric current. A large arc light did not burn properly and Young Tibbetts attempted to adjust it. He grasped a gas fixture near the lamp with his right hand and touched the metal part of the electric lamp with the left, causing the full current to pass through his body. Death was instaneous.

Russia's Persecution.

St. Petersburg special: The rumor of the arrest and banishment of Poles from the western provinces of Russia have been confirmed. Eleven priests have been suspended from their duties and placed in prison and scores of citizens are detained in the citadel at Warsaw. Fifteen persons, including some ladies and young girls, are already on their way to Siberia, although their friends have no knowledge of the nature of their offence.

Frightful Wreck.

A frightful train wreck occurred on the Evansville and Terre Haute Railroad at Vincennes, Ind. Freight train No. 56 was in the yards and Conductor Guthrey sent a flagman back to flag the passenger train, No. 8. For some reason the flagman got into the caboose and let the passenger train run into the freight, demolishing the cars and doing great damage. The flagman was seriously hurt and will die. The engine, caboose, baggage car, mail car and mail matter were burned. Trains were delayed several hours before the track was cleared.

More Cronin Murderers.

Chicago special: State's Attorney Kern says that he has recently unearthed startling evidence that he thinks will enable him to secure the conviction of two men besides Daniel Coughlin now on trial, charged with complicity concerning the Dr. Cronin murder. The other two men's names have not heretofore been mentioned in connection with the crime and their arrest, Mr. Kern says, will be one of the most sensational incidents of the case. The names referred to have not been divulged.

Triple Lynching Avoided.

Charleston (W. Va.) special: Charles Bays, Wash Adkins, and William Burwell, arrested in Fayette County for the murder of Radford at Loup Creek, on the 9th inst., were brought here and lodged in jail. They had a preliminary trial at Fayetteville and confessed to the murder. The officers receiving information that a mob would lynch the murderers, they were brought here for safety.

To Settle Pamirs Difficulty.

Berlin special: It is learned from St. Petersburg that the Russian Government is satisfied with the outcome of the British mission to Afghanistan under Sir Mortimer Durand, and hopes thereby to effect an understanding with England and China with reference to the delimitation of the Pamirs.

They Are Found.

Missoula (Mont.) special: A story comes from Kendrick, Idaho, to the effect that the Carlin party has been found more dead than alive, minus Colgate, the cook, whose pitiful abandonment was necessitated in order that the remainder might be saved.

Lady's Skull Crushed.

Mrs. Sylvanus Stull, wife of a prominent farmer, residing four miles south of Alliance, Ohio, was driving to town, when her horse became unmanageable and upset the carriage. Mrs. Stull was thrown on her head, crushing in the skull. She cannot recover.

Foot Ball.

Yale once more demonstrated her supremacy in foot ball by defeating the Harvard eleven at Hampden Park, Springfield, Mass. It was a mighty contest and won by the smallest possible margin, only one touch down being made.

Powderly Resigns.

General Master Workman Powderly has tendered his resignation to the General Assembly Knights of Labor, in session at Philadelphia.

Killed the Mine Boss.

Charles Bullock, bank boss at Jumbo Mine, Brazil, Ind., who was so badly mashed by a heavy fall of slate several days ago, has since died.

Bagged a Burglar.

At Fairfield, Ill., J. W. Newman heard a noise in his poultry yard and fired at two intruders. The dead body of Charles Hooper, a neighbor, was found on his doorstep.

Big Billiards.

Ex-champion Jacob Schaefer, defeated Champion Frank Ives in the great billiard match at Chicago, the score standing 4,000 for Schaefer to 3,945 for Ives.

CASH OF THE NATION.

ANNUAL REPORT OF TREASURER MORGAN.

Revised Figures Presented to Secretary Carlisle Giving the Condition of the National Treasury—Secretary Morton's Department—Internal Revenue Bureau Report.

Total Stock of Money.

United States Treasurer D. N. Morgan has submitted to Secretary Carlisle his annual report on the operations and condition of the treasury. It shows that the net ordinary revenues for the fiscal year 1893 were $385,819,628, an increase of $30,881,844 over those of the year before. The net ordinary expenditures were $383,447,554, an increase of $38,454,623. There was, therefore, a decrease of $7,772,779 in the surplus revenue, reducing them to $2,341,674. Including the public debt the total receipts were $732,871,214 and the total expenditures $773,097,998. The public funds amounted on June 30, 1892, to $786,351,895, and on June 30, 1893, to $746,538,655. After setting apart those sums of gold, silver and the United States notes which were held for the redemption of certificates of deposit and treasury notes there was left a reserve, or general fund, of $187,012,740 in 1892 and $168,167,391 in 1893. These amounts, however, included certain sums of certificates of deposit, bonds and coupons which were unavailable for any other purpose than the settlement of the treasurer's account, and which, if canceled, would have left an actual available working balance of $165,945,886 and $156,295,169 on the two dates, respectively.

By Sept. 30 this balance had been diminished to $149,250,268, owing to a deficiency in the revenue. In seven months, beginning with last December, upward of $81,000,000 was drawn out of the Treasury in redemption of notes, and the gold reserve was reduced during the same period by $29,000,000. During the next three months, with light redemptions and a deficiency of $19,000,000 in the revenue, the Treasury lost $15,000,000 of gold, but the reserve fell off only $2,000,000. The amount of gold during the fiscal year was the largest ever taken out of the country or brought into it in a like period, being upward of $108,600,000, and that $102,000,000 of it was drawn out of the treasury by the presentation of legal-tender notes. Most of the gold exported in former years was supplied by the treasury in exchange for gold certificates, and the report says that it is the first time that any considerable sums of notes have been presented for the metal. With the exception of an increase of $45,500,000 in the amount of treasury notes, issued in the purchase of silver bullion, and a decrease of $80,000,000 in the combined volume of gold certificates and currency certificates, there has been, the report says, no important change in the public debt.

According to the revised estimate the total stock of money of all kinds in the country on June 30 was $2,323,547,977, or nearly $51,000,000 less than at the same time last year. This contraction took place notwithstanding the addition of $45,500,000 to the stock of silver and an increase of $6,000,000 in the outstanding bank notes, and was caused by the export of gold. In July, however, there began a heavy return movement of the metal, supported by a rapid expansion of bank-note circulation. By the end of September the stock of gold was restored to what it was when the exports began. The total increase of the effective stock of money in the three months was no lower than $95,000,000, bringing it up to a figure much above the highest ever reached before. The treasurer remarks that this sudden contraction and expansion within the space of eleven months affords a striking illustration of the degree of flexibility possessed by the currency. The revised figures for the amount of money in circulation, that is outside the treasury on June 30, place it at $1,596,846,829, or about $6,000,000 less than it was a year before. During the four months ended with October there was an increase of $125,000,000, a record altogether without parallel in the history of the country. The redemption of United States paper currency has been unusually heavy, amounting to $377,000,000 in the fifteen months ended with October.

During the last two fiscal years there was recoined nearly one-fifth of the whole estimated stock of silver, an improvement, the report says, that is expected to increase the popularity and usefulness of this part of the currency. Contrary to expectations, the Columbian souvenir coins have not proved popular. Some of them were never taken out of the Treasury and others have been returned for redemption. An arrangement has been in contemplation under which the half-dollars in the Treasury will be recoined at the expense of the management of the Exposition. It has not yet been decided what disposition is to be made of the quarter dollars of this coinage not disposed of.

SECRETARY MORTON'S REPORT.

The Head of the Agricultural Department Shows What He Has Done.

The Secretary of Agriculture, in his report submitted to the President, regrets the vague character of the department organization, which he says, "offers opulent opportunities for the exercise of the most pronounced paternalism," but he adds that there are many proper ways in which the Federal Government may legitimately serve the cause of agriculture. He devotes considerable space to a review of what he regards as an anomalous partnership between the Government of the United States and the governments of the respective States for the conduct and encouragement of State agricultural colleges and experiment stations. Referring to the sum appropriated for the use of State experiment stations, he says: "This appropriation is unlike any other public moneys legislated out of the treasury of the United States because there is no officer of the United States authorized to direct, limit, control or audit its itemized expenditures." He suggests that the stations should be entirely divorced from the department and the sum appropriated charged directly to them, or that the Secretary should have some power to direct and restrain their disbursements so as to insure a legitimate expenditure of the same. He adds that in view of the rumors that have obtained credence in some of the States and Territories to the effect that moneys appropriated to the stations have been diverted from their legitimate purposes, a thorough investigation should be made to demonstrate either the truth or falsity of such reports.

In reference to expenditures the Secretary states that his strenuous endeavor, in view of a depleted public treasury and of the imperative demands of taxpayers for economy in the administration of the Government, has been to "rationally reduce expenditures by the elimination from the pay rolls of all persons not needed for an efficient conduct of the affairs of the department." The distribution of seeds at the public expense is reviewed at length and its growth traced from the year 1839, when Commissioner of Patents Ellsworth obtained an appropriation of $1,000 for the purpose of collecting and distributing rare varieties of seed and for other purposes. He shows a considerable saving to have been effected in the purchase and the distribution of the seed this year.

The work of the Bureau of Animal Industry is reviewed in detail. The result of the Texas fever regulations is pronounced to be highly satisfactory, but to increase their efficiency it is suggested that a penalty should attach for violation of the department regulations by railroad companies transporting infected cattle. A further reduction has been effected by vessel inspection in the percentage of cattle lost at sea, the ratio being for the last year less than one-half of 1 per cent. The law at present does not provide for the inspection of horses imported into the country and an amendment in this respect is suggested. As regards meat inspection the microscopical inspection has been greatly reduced, the intention being to confine it rigidly to products intended for direct export to countries exacting the same. Promiscuous free distribution of publications is condemned, and the suggestion made that, after supplying certain copies free to libraries and educational institutions, a moderate price should be charged for the remaining copies. Of the weather bureau it is stated that the work has been carried on with improved efficiency and economy, a reduction in cost of maintenance of nearly 10 per cent. being effected, and estimates for the fiscal year being correspondingly reduced.

INTERNAL REVENUE REPORT.

Receipts for the Current Fiscal Year Will Be Less than the Estimates.

Joseph Miller, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, has submitted to Secretary Carlisle his report of the operations of the bureau for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893, and also certain additional information relating to the collections made and work performed during the first three months of the current fiscal year. It is a long document of over 200 printed pages and includes a number of tables containing much statistical information on the operation of the bureau, some of which date back for thirty years. The report shows that the receipts from all sources of internal revenue have increased from $116,902,869 for the fiscal year 1886 to $161,004,989 in 1893. The estimates of the last commissioner of internal revenue were that the receipts of 1893 would reach $165,000,000, but owing to the general business depression Mr. Miller says this amount was not realized. He estimates that the receipts for the fiscal year will be $150,000,000.

The receipts for the fiscal year 1892 were $153,857,544. The receipts for 1893 were made up as follows: Spirits, $94,720,260, an increase of $3,410,276 over the previous year; tobacco, $31,889,771, an increase of $889,218; fermented liquors, $32,548,983, an increase of $2,511,530; oleomargarine, $1,670,643, an increase of $404,317; and miscellaneous, $175,390, a decrease of $67,898. The receipts from internal revenue for the first three months of the fiscal year 1894 have been $36,874,402, a decrease of $5,519,143 as compared with the first three months of the fiscal year 1893. Of this decrease $3,830,858 has been in the taxes on spirits and $1,828,882 on tobacco. The cost of collecting the revenue during 1893 was $4,219,769. The expenses for the previous fiscal year were $4,315,946, being 2.80 per cent. of the collections. The estimated expenses for 1895 are $4,498,580.

ACT OF A DRUNKEN FIEND.

Jordan Kills His Wife, Her Sister, and Parents, and Himself.

As the result of a terrible tragedy growing out of a family feud five persons are dead in their country home several miles east of Seymour, Ind., says a dispatch. Four years ago Clinton Jordan, then 21 years old, married a daughter of Joshua Foster, with whom he never lived happily. Last week they separated, and she returned to the home of her father.

The other night Jordan met his father-in-law and accompanied him home in spite of his protests, as he feared trouble. Jordan promised to behave, but soon after his arrival at Foster's home he began a quarrel. When Foster then ordered him out of the house Jordan fired at the old man. The ball missed him and struck Cora Foster, aged 17, in the head, killing her instantly. A second shot hit Foster in the head and knocked him down. The old man picked himself up and ran about half a mile to the home of another of his sons-in-laws, William Powell. He fell unconscious and lingered until late in the afternoon, when he died. Jordan then turned his revolver on Mrs. Foster, his mother-in-law, shooting her in the neck, the ball ranging downward and causing a wound from which she died. Jordan's wife attempted to defend her mother, and he stabbed her repeatedly in the breast, hands and face, and ended by shooting her through the head. Jordan then opened his vest, placed the revolver against his breast, and sent a ball through his heart. He dropped dead, falling across the dead body of his wife. The revolver was new and had evidently been bought with premeditated purpose of killing his victims. The knife with which the murderer's wife was so cruelly gashed was also new and long and had been freshly sharpened. Jordan had an unsavory reputation and in frequent spells of intoxication was ugly and quarrelsome. All the other victims were peaceful and orderly citizens. Jordan, the assassin and suicide, was illiterate and stupid, but had always been considered harmless.

BIG BLAZE AT HANNIBAL.

Property Worth $265,000 Wiped Out—Help from Quincy.

The total loss by Saturday night's fire at Hannibal, Mo., foots up to $265,000, on which there is insurance aggregating $155,000. The fire broke out about 6 o'clock and resulted from the explosion of a lamp in the establishment of the Williams-Voorhis Dry-Goods company, the largest store in the city, occupying a three-story block on the corner of Main and Church streets. In ten minutes the building was a mass of flames, and the gale which prevailed carried the fire through the block and across the street. The Hannibal fire department was helpless, and two steamers from Quincy, Ill., were fighting the flames within an hour after the lamp explosion. The combined forces were only able to confine the flames to the blocks first visited. The telegraph and telephone lines were inoperative, and the storm of ice and sleet which followed further crippled the wires in all directions.

A VERDICT was rendered in Brooklyn for $17,000 against S. V. White & Co., the brokers, in favor of Eugene Palmer, who charges that he lost that amount in a transaction with White's Chicago house.

TARIFF REFORM BILL

PROVISIONS OF THE WILSON MEASURE MADE PUBLIC.

Free List Extended to Wool, Coal, Lumber, Salt and Iron Ore—Its Enactment Would End Reciprocity and Require Revision of Treaties.

Extensive Free List.

The new Democratic tariff bill has been given to the public, and, according to a Washington dispatch, its provisions fulfill every expectation that it might be a radical measure of reform. In many respects it is a surprise even to the Democratic members of Congress, as it is unprecedented in many of its provisions. The free list is of that liberal scope sufficient to satisfy the most radical advocates of reform and the repudiation of the principle of reciprocity which has been the pride of the Republicans is decisive and emphatic. It will necessitate a readjustment of treaties with those South American countries which enjoy practical or theoretical reciprocity with the United States. The bounty on sugar is to be repealed by easy gradations and will not reach its conclusive effect until after the end of the present century.

On and after the 1st of March, 1894, the following articles are to be added to the free list:

Bacon and hams, beef, mutton and pork, and meats of all kinds, prepared or preserved, not specially provided for in this act.

Baryta.

All binding twine manufactured in whole or in part from thistle or tampico fiber, manila, sisal grass or sunn, of single ply and measuring not exceeding 600 feet to the pound.

Birds, stuffed, not suitable for millinery ornaments, and bird skins, prepared for preservation, but not further advanced in manufacture.

Blue vitriol, or sulphate of copper.

Bone char, suitable for use in decorating sugars.

Coal, bituminous, and shale, and coal slack or cut; coke; coal tar, crude, and all preparations and products of coal tar, not colors or dyes, not specially provided for in this act.

Oxide of cobalt.

Copper imported in the form of ores; old copper, fit only for manufacture; clipping from new copper, and all composition metal of which copper is a component material of chief value not specially provided for in this act; regulus of copper and black or coarse copper, and copper cement, copper in plates, bars, ingots, or pigs, and other forms, not manufactured, not specially provided for in this act.

Copperas, or sulphate of iron.

Cotton-ties of iron or steel cut to lengths, punched or not punched, with or without buckles, for belting cotton.

Diamonds, dust or bort, and jewels to be used in the manufacture of watches or clocks.

Yelks of eggs of birds, fish and insects.

Fresh fish.

Furs, undressed.

Iodine.

Resublimated iron ore; also the dross or residuum from burnt pyrites and sulphur and pyrites or sulphuret of iron in its natural state.

Lard.

Lemon juice; lime juice, and sour orange juice.

Mica, and metallic mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought, not specially provided for in this act.

Ochre and ochery earths; sienna and sienna earths; umber and umber earths, not specially provided for in this act.

Cotton seed oil, paintings, in oil or water colors, and statuary, not otherwise provided for in this act.

Plush, black, for making men's hats.

Quicksilver.

Salt.

Silk, partially manufactured from cocoons or from waste silk, and not farther advanced or manufactured than carded or combed silk.

Soap, all not otherwise specially provided for in this act.

Sulphate of soda, or salt cake, or nitre cake; sulphuric acid.

Tallow and oil grease, including that known commercially as De Gras, or brown wool grease.

Straw.

Burr stone, bound up into millstones; free stone, granite, sandstone, limestone, and other building or monumental, except marble, unmanufactured or undressed, not specially provided for in this act.

All wearing apparel and other personal effects shall be admitted free of duty, without regard to their value, upon their identity being established under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Timber, hewn and sawed, and timber used for spars and in building wharves; timber squared or sided; sawed boards, planks, deals and other lumber; laths; pickets and palings; shingles; staves of wood of all kinds; wood unmanufactured; provided, that if any export duty is laid upon the above-mentioned articles, or either of them, all said articles imported from said country shall be subject to duty as now provided by law.

Chair cane, or reeds, wrought or manufactured from rattans or reeds.

Weeds, namely, cedar, lignum vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all forms of cabinet woods, in the log, rough or hewn.

Bamboo and ratten, unmanufactured.

Briar root or briar wood and similar wood unmanufactured.

Reeds and sticks of partridge, hair wood, pimento, orange, myrtle and other woods in the rough, or not further manufactured than cut into lengths suitable for sticks for umbrellas, parasols, sun shades, whips or walking canes.

All wool of the sheep, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals, and all wool and hair on the skin. Nails, yarn waste, card waste, bur waste, rags, and flax, including all waste, or rags, composed wholly or in part of wool.

Average Cut of 35 Per Cent.

The average cut in duties, says the Washington correspondent, is between 35 and 40 per cent., with no duty going beyond 50 per cent. ad valorem and very few coming up to that mark. The uniform substitution of ad valorem for specific duties makes it quite difficult in many instances to accurately estimate the extent of the cut until actual experience in importations gives some guide by which to go. The actual loss from additions to the free list can be computed on the basis of importations for the fiscal year 1892, but not for the year '93, because complete statistics are not at hand. When the two years are averaged it will probably appear that the additions to the free list will be to cut down revenues by $30,000,000 to $32,000,000; of this $8,000,000 may be placed to the account of free wool; coal will cause $1,000,000 deficiency; iron ore, $750,000; lumber, $900,000; salt, $400,000; silver lead ore, $850,000; flax straw, hemp, etc., $250,000. The duties on other articles which will go on the free list have ranged from $5,000 to $250,000. The total on the chemical schedule will be a large one.

Tinplate is not made free. The old rate of 1 cent a pound is fixed, and it is estimated that $11,000,000 may be secured, or $2,500,000 more than can be counted on under the present law. There has been great contention over woolens, but with few exceptions the rates run from 25 to 35 per cent. ad valorem, rarely rising to 40 per cent.

Antiquity of the Bagpipe.

A representation of the bagpipe was found in the ruins of Tarsus. The instrument was in use 2,000 years before the Christian era, and its origin is unknown.

In one end of the building is also located the offices of the company. The prompt action taken by the officials and men saved the building. The loss will not exceed $700. It is supposed that the fire was the work of some of the convicts.

ONE of the boldest robberies ever perpetrated in Lawrence County occurred the other night a short distance from Enon Valley. The victim of the robbery was Mrs. Mary Williams the aged wife of John Williams, a farmer. Williams was away from home. At 11 o'clock there was a rap at the door, and when Mrs. Williams opened it she was confronted by three revolvers in the hands of masked men. The old lady screamed once, when all three of the men sprang upon her, and in a minute she was helpless, bound and gagged. After torturing her for more than an hour the old lady finally disclosed the hiding place of the money, and the robbers secured $200 in gold, after which they fled. Mrs. Williams was found next morning still bound and gaged. Her condition is serious, and it is probable that she will not survive the shock and the injuries she received.

The Story of a Woman's Atonement, by Charlotte M. Braeme.

CHAPTER XVI.

"Do you hate me, Captain Flemyng?" she asked.

"Do I hate you?" he echoed. "Oh, Lady Charnleigh, what a strange, cruel question. Why should I hate you?"

"Because I have come between you and a magnificent inheritance," she replied. "But for me Crown Leighton would have been yours; you would have been in the place you could so nobly fill."

"Lady Charnleigh, believe me, no thought of repining has ever entered my mind. I am happy in the loss, seeing that it is your gain."

"I have often wished that I knew you and could write and say it—I have always intended to say it to you the first time we met. Captain Flemyng, let us forget how distant is our relationship, and try to imagine we are both members of one family."

"I am more than willing—I am honored beyond words."

"And now what I am almost afraid to say. If we were brother and sister, I could say to you, 'out of the wealth of my abundance, out of the ample means that would have been yours, take what you want.' Will you let me say that now? You would make me the happiest woman living if you would."

Again the dark handsome face flushed.

"I am not angry, dear Lady Charnleigh, for I understand the noble, generous heart that prompts the offer; but, while I thank you for it, let me say it would be easier for me to die than to accept it."

"Have I annoyed you?" she asked, anxiously.

"No, you have shown me how generous you are. If I had inherited the fortune, I should have been just as anxious to share it with you. No, most generous lady, I shall carve my own fortune. You remember those glorious words, 'There is no fate in life save such as a strong hand carves or a weak hand mars.' My hand is strong."

"I am sure of it," she said, looking at him with admiration. "I am very proud of my kinsman; you will be different from the rest of the world to me—something apart. You must never flatter me, but treat me as you would a younger sister of your own—we are of one race, you know."

"Your frankness makes me happy, Lady Charnleigh. I shall esteem the offer you have made as the highest life can hold." Suddenly he broke off and exclaimed, "I know that face—it is Bertram Gordon's."

And the next moment the two friends had clasped each other's hands. If Paul Flemyng had seen how the beautiful face flushed, he would have guessed that Lady Charnleigh was not indifferent to the grand, noble man whose friendship had always been a keen source of delight to him. Then the three whose lives were so strangely interwoven sat down by the bank of the river.

"Yes, people talk of the grandeur of tropical foliage. I do not think, for delicacy and beauty of color, there is anything to compare with our English trees; and their greatest beauty, to my mind, is in the spring-time, when the buds are tender. Do you not agree with me, Lady Charnleigh?"

"I am sure everything that you say is right," she replied. His question had aroused her from a deep reverie, and both gentlemen laughed at her abrupt candor.

"You will cause me to weigh most carefully everything that I say, Lady Charnleigh. You have been very kind to me—may I ask a favor of you?"

Her face cleared.

"Yes, twenty if you will; it would be a great happiness to do anything for you."

Sir Bertram had at first felt half inclined to be jealous of his dark-haired handsome soldier, but the frankness and kindness of her words disarmed him. It was not thus, he felt sure, women talked to the men they loved. When she look at Paul Flemyng her eyes were full of admiration, of kindly liking—it was seldom that he himself won one glance from those violet eyes; when he did they wore quite a different expression.

"I have some friends coming to London very soon—General Sir Huntley Dacre, and his daughter, Miss Ethel Dacre. Lady Charnleigh, will you allow me to introduce her to you, and will you help her?"

"I shall be only too pleased to show all possible kindness to friends of yours. In what way can I help her?"

"She is very young, and in my opinion, very beautiful. Her mother has long been dead, and she has been alone with the General for some time. She has not seen much of this great, gay world of yours, and it would be kind of you to introduce her to some of your many friends, and to let her spend as much of her time as possible with you."

"I am going to weigh your words," she said laughingly; "why do you call this great, gay world mine?"

"Because it seems to me that you are one of its queens," he replied.

"Do you say Miss Dacre is beautiful?"

"I have looked at the sun, and so cannot see the stars."

"Your poetry is flattery—we agreed that you should never flatter me."

Then Sir Bertram interposed. This handsome soldier, with his reputation for bravery, was likely to prove a dangerous rival, and her friendly liking for him might develop into something warmer. He thought it high time to draw Lady Charnleigh's attention to himself.

"Is Miss Dacre a young lady?" he asked.

There was not the least embarrassment or confusion on the Captain's face.

"Yes, she is of about the same age as Lady Charnleigh, I should imagine. She will be an acquisition to London society. Lady Charnleigh, I hope you will like her."

"I am sure to do that because you have asked me," she replied.

"You are very kind. When they reach London, then, I will, with your permission, bring the General and Miss Dacre to see you."

Here Lady Denham joined them.

CHAPTER XVII.

If anyone had been asked at that particular time to name the happiest woman in London society, he would surely have named the Countess of Charnleigh. She had youth, exceptional beauty, wealth, position, everything, in fact, that the human heart could wish for. There was not a cloud on her sky.

One beautiful morning the young Countess was sitting alone in the cool, fragrant drawing-room. The rose-colored blinds were drawn, and the light that came through them was mellow and rich; the odor of white daphnes filled the air. The windows were open, and she could hear the song of the birds and the distant roll of carriages. Luxury, magnificence, and grandeur surrounded the young girl.

She wore a pretty morning-dress of white, shining material, trimmed with lace and blue ribbons; her golden hair fell in waving masses on her beautiful neck and shoulders. She held a book in her hands, but she never turned a page. Leonie, Lady Charnleigh, was thinking. Before her mind's eye flitted many and various figures—Lord Falcon, Paul Flemyng and Sir Bertram. She was thinking long and deeply; presently her face flushed and the beautiful lips trembled.

"I will be true to my love," she said to herself, "come what may, I will be true to myself."

Then she started up in sheer surprise. Capt. Flemyng stood beside her, smiling at her evident abstraction, and by his side was a young girl. Gen. Dacre stood near.

"Lady Charnleigh, let me introduce Gen. Dacre and his daughter, Miss Dacre, to you," said Paul.

The young countess looked and saw a face that attracted her at first sight; it was beautiful, intelligent, full of poetry, with clear, dark eyes that had something of sadness in their depths. She looked earnestly in the eloquent face, and then clasped the girl's hands in her own.

"Capt. Flemyng told me that I should like you," she said, impulsively; "I do not think he was wrong."

Then she greeted the General, who, like every one else, fell captive to her lovely face.

"You will stay and spend the day with me, Miss Dacre? Capt. Flemyng has promised to take me to the Botanical Gardens; it will give us both so much pleasure if you will go also. We shall know each other better if we spend a day together than if we only met among strangers."

It was a remarkable fact that people seldom refused to do as Lady Charnleigh wished. Ethel Dacre did not attempt to resist.

Two hours later they were at the Botanical Gardens. Had Lady Charnleigh searched the world over she could not have found a companion who contrasted so strikingly with herself. They were both lovely, but in style quite opposite. Lady Charnleigh was fair, bright, and radiant, there was sunshine in her face and golden hair. Miss Dacre was dark, with somewhat of poetry and sadness in her features.

Their appearance in the gardens caused no little sensation. To Lady Charnleigh's annoyance, the Duchess of Rockhampton and her son, Lord Falcon, were there, and would insist upon engrossing her time and attention. She had intended to devote herself to Ethel, but the Duchess urged her so pressingly to go with her to look at some Indian flowers that she could not refuse.

Paul and Ethel were left together. Miss Dacre looked long and earnestly after the frank, imperial girl; then her eyes grew dim with tears, and she turned to her companion.

"You are right, Captain Flemyng," she said. "The Countess of Charnleigh is indeed beautiful."

"Is she not, Ethel? But to me her beauty is her least charm. Her frank, gay, bright manner, her kindness, and the winning fascination of her speech, are greater than her beauty."

"How you love her!" said the girl, wistfully. "I must confess that I do not wonder at it."

"We are very dear friends," replied Paul, all unconscious of the pain in that gentle heart

"I am told," she continued, "that Lady Charnleigh has many lovers."

"She knows how to keep them in order," he said.

"And so much homage does not spoil her?" pursued Ethel.

"No—she has a frank, imperial manner with her which nothing can spoil. Ah, Ethel, I am so pleased you will be friends. Lady Charnleigh does not go into raptures, you must understand, with every girl she meets. She liked you at first—I saw it in her face."

"It is for your sake," she said, gently, and the sweet flattery was most gracious to him. "You have studied her face well," she added, with some little bitterness, "to be able to read her thoughts upon it."

"They are so plainly written," said the captain.

"Do you remember the old lines?" she asked, trying to speak lightly:

> "My only books were women's looks,
> And folly all they taught me."

"Ah, Ethel," said Paul Flemyng, "the words speak falsely—a wise man may learn the highest lessons and the truest wisdom from a woman's face."

CHAPTER XVIII.

Of Ethel Dacre, Lady Charnleigh had grown very fond; there was a warm and sincere attachment between them. They were useful to each other. From Leonie, Ethel learned many of the world's ways, little lessons in the art of savoir vivre; she acquired more gayety, greater brightness of look and word, some of the bright, pretty graces that add so great a charm to life. And from Ethel, Lady Charnleigh learned high and holy thoughts, lessons of gentle wisdom that she would never have learned from another. And yet, though they were dear friends, although their intimacy was of the most familiar kind, they never as yet had indulged in the usual conversation about love and lovers.

Lady Charnleigh, so bright, so happy, had a certain conviction that Ethel had some sorrow preying upon her mind.

"There is at times a listless look about her, and I have seen her dark eyes fill with tears. Ethel has her secret, although she may never tell it to me."

In the drawing-room of Lady Charnleigh's superb mansion, Ethel Dacre sat one morning alone. She was going to the exhibition of the Royal Academy with her friend, and the Countess had not yet completed her toilet. Ethel looked very lovely on that bright morning; her eloquent face was flushed into the fairest bloom by the fresh morning air, her dark eyes were clear and true as the morning star itself. She had taken a book from the table and was reading to pass away the time until Lady Charnleigh should come.

She had accidentally alighted upon that sweet love story of Elaine—the history of surely the sweetest, purest love ever given to man; and, as she read, the printed words faded, the passionate melody of the verse had found an echo in her heart. Even as Elaine had loved the grand and noble hero, so she loved Paul Flemyng. Even as Lancelot had no heart, no thought, no eyes for any save Queen Guinevere, so he, Paul Flemyng cared for no one living save the beautiful young countess, who was "all a queen should be—and more."

It was her own story—love won, unsought for.

"Only that I would never tell him," she said to herself. "I would die, looking in his face with a smile, rather than tell him. I would suffer torture greater than that of a martyr on the rack or the wheel, but I would never let him know. I would carry my secret to the grave with me, and it should be buried deeper down than myself. Even in death he should never know it."

She started, for a white hand lay on the open page of the book.

"Ethel, dreaming again! What! Are you reading about Elaine? How strange. Do you know that in my own mind I have often compared you to the 'Lily Maid?' She must have had a face like yours."

Ethel Dacre made no answer.

"Just such a face," continued the young Countess, looking lovingly at her friend, "full of poetry, of love that had never been told; pure as a lily-leaf, sweet as the face of an angel—sad sometimes with a sadness half saintly; that is like you and like Elaine."

The proud head was raised; the fair voice replied:

"It may be so. You have a vivid fancy, Lady Charnleigh; but I shall not share Elaine's fate. I will not die of love for one who loves me not."

"Heaven forbid!" cried Lady Charnleigh. She kissed the white brow, looking tenderly at the girl. "I do not know how it is, Ethel; but when I look at you, I think that yours is the very face for a tragical love story. You are like Elaine and Juliet. I have seen that same expression on other faces—a kind of prophecy, as it were, written there, that undisturbed happiness is not to be the portion of the owner. I hope I am wrong, but I have this thought of you."

"You are not a prophetess, Lady Charnleigh; you are only a belle and a woman of fashion. I shall not heed what you say."

But the white hands tightened their caressing hold of her.

"Tell me, Ethel—is there not some one you love very much—some one you care for more than all the world beside—some sad, sweet secret of your own that you have never told to others, but you will tell to me? Is it not so, Ethel?"

She drew the sweet face close to her own and held it there.

"Will you not trust me, Ethel, your sister and your friend? Ah, sweet, do not turn away; see, your tears have dropped on the open page. Why did Elaine's story touch you, Ethel?"

"Because I love all poetry, and I believe sadness has a greater charm for me than joy." She withdrew herself from the loving arms and looked almost haughtily at Lady Charnleigh. "How you weave romances!" she cried. "You had better take to writing novels. You will make me believe myself romantic and unhappy, whereas I am nothing of the kind. As for love, I love nothing on earth except——"

"Captain Flemyng, my lady," said a servant's voice at the door, and Leonie laughed gayly.

"If you could only guess how apropos was the announcement of your name," she said to the young soldier, holding out her hand. "It was delightful."

Paul looked from the laughing face of the young Countess to Ethel, whose face burned with blushes.

"I do not understand," he returned.

"Happily so," said Lady Charnleigh. "Is it not time we started, Captain Flemyng? I have been twice to the exhibition, and have hardly seen a picture."

"How has that happened?" he asked.

"I am so unfortunate; the rooms always seemed filled with my own particular friends."

"You hold a court there; so that is why you expressed a wish to go so early this morning."

"Yes; perhaps fortune will smile; and if she frowns, Capt. Flemyng, you must do all the talking, while Ethel and I look at the pictures."

"That is to say, I must amuse my Lord Falcon, charm his grace of Alton, talk earnestly to Sir Bertram Gordon, tease poor Maj. Newsham, look sentimental with the young poet Clive Dering. No, thank you, Lady Charnleigh; you ask impossibilities."

"Do you mean to say seriously that I do all that at once?" she inquired.

"All, and more. You can charm every one who approaches you, but you cannot expect me to charm for you."

"I do not want to charm any one," she said, quietly.

"Not even one?" he said.

"No—not one; at least——" and then her face flushed, and Leonie, Lady Charnleigh, with a low sweeping bow, led the way to the carriage that waited for them.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

PHYSIOGNOMY.

In the perfect mouth the upper lip should have its middle line deeply sunk, and the lower lip should be not more prominent than the upper.

Large, open and transparent eyes, which move rapidly and sparkle in excitement, indicate good taste, discernment, pride and often irritability.

Ears, the lobes of which run straight down into the cheeks, are rarely found save on persons of a thievish disposition; all kleptomaniacs have such ears.

Strongly projecting foreheads, which, in the upper part, retreat to a marked degree, associated with a long underface, are certain indications of folly.

Men of marked ability in any line have usually one deep, perpendicular wrinkle in the middle of the forehead, with one or two parallel to it on each side.

Whenever, in laughing, three parallel curves are formed in the cheeks round the corners of the mouth, the indication is of silliness and stupidity.

Heavy, shaggy, overhanging eyebrows, with lower forehead prominent, show great powers of reasoning from premise to conclusion; Darwin had such brows.

When the lower half of the countenance, measuring from the nose downward, is divided by the mouth into two equal parts, seen in profile, the indication is of stupidity.

A perfectly formed face should be divided into three equal parts; from the roots of the hair to the root of the nose, thence to the tip, and from the tip of the nose to the tip of the chin.

Persons whose temples are fuller above the eyes than below, whose heads enlarge above the ears, are usually more gifted with musical taste than those with contrary characteristics.

Noses turned up at the point and sinking in at the top are inclined to ease and pleasure, though at the same time they may be gifted with eloquence and imagination, and are almost always benevolent.

A Queer English Custom.

The Duke of Edinburgh, or rather the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, to call him by his highest title, will be literally turned out of house and home within a few days, having received notice to vacate Clarence House "within a reasonable period." This is in accordance with the established custom which prescribes that any member of the royal family who becomes a reigning sovereign must cease to occupy any house or apartments belonging to the British crown after a reasonable time. This regulation was made to avoid a repetition of the trouble with the King of Hanover, who positively refused to get out when requested and had almost to be evicted like an Irish farmer.

Do NOT anticipate trouble, or worry about what may never happen. Keep in the sunlight, was Franklin's sensible advice.

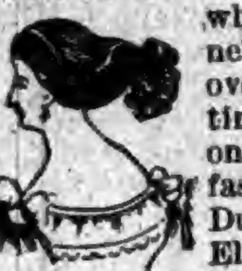
WERE NOT PRETTY.

SOME OF FASHION'S VAGARIES IN OTHER DAYS.

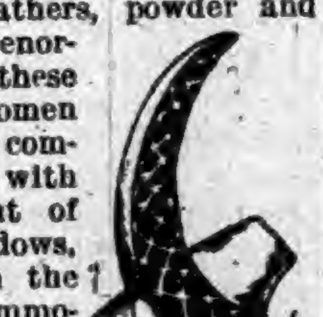
Women with Coiffures Three Feet High and Men Who Had to Be Forced Into Their Skin-tight Breeches—The Wig and the "Commode."

Some Enormities.

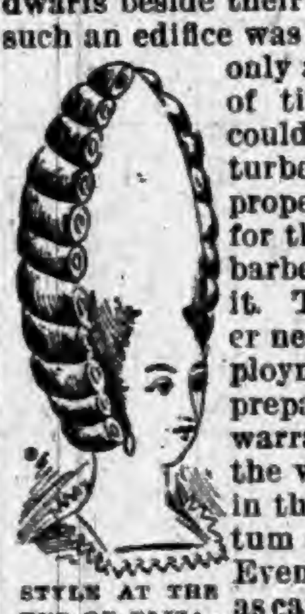
Tyrannical as fashion is to-day her rule is mild and commonplace compared to what it was in ages gone by which some of our ne'er-satisfied sigh over as the "good old times." The wig is one of those abhorred fashions of the past. During the reign of Elizabeth it was the fashion for the dandies to comb their wigs in public. The combs thus displayed were of large size, of ivory or tortoise shell, curiously ornamented, and were carried in the pockets as constantly as the snuff box. Wigs as well as natural hair were dyed, red strangely enough being the favorite color in Elizabethan days. The virgin Queen herself possessed no less than eighty wigs. When wigs were changed from flowing to crisp locks the ladies' heads went through some amazing metamorphoses. The hair was disposed in rows of curls towering up, one above the other, to a tremendous height. Then came the "commode"—an actual tower of true and false hair, ribbons, feathers, powder and pomatum. So enormous were these "heads" that women of fashion were compelled to ride with them thrust out of the carriage windows, or kneel down in the carriage to accommodate them within. The body of the vast edifice was formed of tow. Over this the hair was turned, and false hair added in great curls, bobs and ties, all powdered in profusion; then hung all over with vulgarly large rows of pearls, or even glass beads. Above this came flowers and the whole was surmounted by broad, silken bands and great ostrich feathers. The entire structure added about three feet to the lady's legitimate height, and caused the gentlemen to look like dwarfs beside their wives. Of course such an edifice was to be constructed only at a vast expense of time and labor and could not lightly be disturbed. Heads, when properly dressed, "kept for three weeks," as the barbers quietly phrased it. To keep them longer necessitated the employment of numerous preparations sold and warranted to destroy the vermin which bred in the flour and pomatum so liberally used. Even garden stuff, such as carrots and parsnips, were used in the building up and adornment of a head. These heads excited the satire of the poets and one of them thus sings:



COIFFURE OF 1759.



PEAKED BONNET.

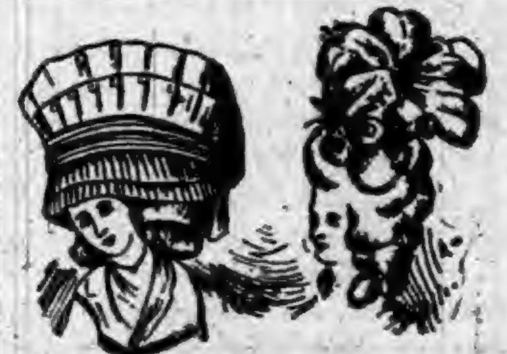


STYLE AT THE END OF ELIZABETH'S REIGN.

> "O let a windmill decorate the hair,
> A windmill, apter emblem of the fair!
> As every blast of air impels the vane,
> So every blast of folly whirls their brain."

Skin-Tight Breeches.

King George IV., when he was Prince of Wales, first introduced buckskin breeches as an indispensable fashionable morning garment. This article was made to fit so close to the person that, we read, the maker and a couple of assistants were usually required to aid at the ceremony of trying it on. In some instances it was actually suspended from the ceiling by machinery, and the wearer descended into it, endeavoring, partly by the influence of his natural gravity and partly by the pullings and haulings of those around him, to get home into the shell prepared for him. The effect of three hours' work of this kind (and the task lasted that time) may be imagined, especially if it was in the summer time. To walk in them was a torture, and to get out of them no less; but the dandy submitted to all with the devotion of a new-made saint and the imperturbable firmness of a martyr.



HEADDRESSES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

The peaked bonnet of which we give an illustration was the fashion during the reigns of the Plantagenets, but died out, as it ought to have done before, in the reign of Elizabeth. Another of our illustrations deals with the toilet of a fashionable woman in 1759. The tonier mode of dressing the hair necessitated a new kind of headdress. This, of which we print an illustration, consisted chiefly of laces, gauze, wire, and ribbons and feathers, intended to protect rather than weigh down the immense head which it covered. Equally ungraceful and fashionable was the monstrous cap of the fair Mary Anne Robinson, the first love of King George IV.

ALMANACS.

From Harper's Bazar,

It is said that the first almanac printed in Europe was probably the Kalendarium Novum, by Regiomontanus. It was "calculated for the years 1475, 1494, and 1513." In Buda, Hungary, it was published.

Though it simply made mention of eclipses and the places of the planets for the respective years, it was sold for ten crowns of gold; and the entire impression was rapidly disposed of in Hungary, Germany, Italy, England, and France.

The first almanac—recorded as the first—known to have been printed in England was translated from the French, and appeared in 1497.

Each month introduced itself in descriptive verse, as:

"Called I am Janeryere the colde.
In Christmas season good fyre I love.
Yonge Jesu, that sometime Judas solde,
In me was circumcised for man's behove.
Three Kinges sought the sonne of God above—
They kneeled downe, dyd Him homage with love
To God their Lorde, that is man's own brother."

And so on, for the remaining months.

We have seen it mentioned that an eminent jurist, who has lately passed away, had a great mania for collecting and storing up a copy of every calendar heard of; no matter to him what nostrums were in connection advertised, whenever a page revealed the signs of the zodiac and the phases of the moon, it immediately settled the question of purchase and ownership; and it is added that piles and piles of them, limitless in variety, were found among his treasured things. It has been estimated that this collection by an American gentleman may be regarded as the most extensive of its kind known.

MARTIN SHEETS.

He Got His Money.

One of Wm. Ruhl's horses died a week or two ago, and yet he got paid for it. It was because he had it insured. E. Watson, agent at this place for the Crawfordsville Live Stock Insurance Co., has just settled with Mr. Ruhl at a satisfactory price and paid the loss in cash. The insurance company deserves great credit for the promptness and square dealing it has shown. They ought to get a good business here.

The Musical Monthly.

The November number of the Musical Monthly has reached us, and is as usual, filled to the covers with valuable music, both vocal and instrumental. Of the songs, we note "La Gitana," (The Gipsy Girl) "Maggie, Who lives at the Farm," and "To Sevilla," a song in both English and German. There are fine new instrumental pieces, all pronounced excellent by those competent to judge of the merits of music. The price of the magazine is 15 cents a copy or $1.50 a year. Address, Richard A. Salfield, 794 Tenth Ave., New York.

Testimonial.

When Mrs. J. H. St. Clair, of Hawley, Kansas, was back a year or two ago, she bought a Swing Washer of Mr. Meese. This last summer Mr. and Mrs. Charles Pommert, of this place, spent part of the summer with Mr. St. Clair's family, Mr S., being a brother of Mrs. Pommert. The two ladies used the washing machine, and Mrs. Pommert became as enthusiastic over it, as was Mrs. St. Clair, and on her return to Auburn, she got one of her own, and uses it each week. Both ladies agree that it does its work quicker, better and is much pleasanter to work with, than any other machine. As it is closed, the steam does not escape to drench the walls, or to heat up the person, making it more pleasant to hang out the clothes. Both ladies authorize us to say that no washer they ever tried is equal to the Auburn Swing Washer. It is easy to operate and does its work quickly.

THE AUBURN COURIER

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY.

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana, post-office as second-class matter.

THURSDAY....NOVEMBEB 30, 1893.

ANDERSON, this state, is to have a new rolling mill, to employ 400 men in making iron and steel of various sorts.

INDIANA is likely to get a large brass foundry. Parties have bought land at Porter station, up the road in Porter county, and expect to start a plant that will employ 150 men at first. Other factories are to be located there.

Our Cash Money.

The total amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the United States is $659,167,949. The total amount of silver dollars is $419,332,550; and of smaller silver coin we have $76,977,002. Of silver bullion not coined we have 140,699,760 ounces of fine metal, which will make in coin, $181,914,941. This, when coined, will give us a grand total of silver money of $601,247,391. The silver dollars are legal tender for any amount. The small silver is legal tender for ten dollars. So it will be seen that we actually have of coined gold and silver money a total of $1,155,477,501; in other words 1,155 millions and over. Add to this the uncoined silver bars or bullion on hand, and which will probably soon be coined, we have a total of gold and silver money of $1,336,392,342, or over 1,337 millions in hard money. As remarked above, there is some gold, as well as quite a large amount of silver not yet coined. The law repealing the Sherman act directs that the portion of the silver representing the government's "seigniorage" must be coined, and likely a new law will soon be made directing that all silver bars be coined. All gold bullion will be coined in any event. So it will be seen that the highest figure we have given represents what will soon be our total coined metal money. It is also probable that a new law will be enacted requiring still more silver to be coined, probably a certain amount each month. The above figures are correct and easily got at. What puzzles the ordinary citizen the most is how to get hold of these very attractive pieces of metal—these gold and silver coins. No matter how much money there is, we will still need some way of getting a portion. We must have labor, or farm products, or manufactured products to sell, in order to get the money into our own pockets.

Feels Bad but Says Little.

The Hudson World gets a little wilder even than usual in its comments on what we said about its wild utterances. But it does not even attempt to answer a thing we said except the Van Alen matter. And the Van Alen business does not amount to much any way. Van Alen denies and so does the democratic committee, the giving of a sum of money for an office. But even if true, why does not the editor of the World rebuke Harrison, who put right into his very cabinet the man, Wanamaker, who raised, and never denied it, $400,000 for a campaign fund? This was the money that made Indiana republican by about 2,000. The World shows its true position by closing with "Let the COURIER and its party sink." But never fear. The COURIER and the democratic party will be alive and vigorous when the Hudson—Ashley World—Angola Sun, and its party—if it have any—will be forgotten.

Send Us News Items.

When anything worth publishing or of interest to readers of the county generally, happens in your neighborhood send it to the COURIER. In this way it will reach every part of DeKalb county pretty thoroughly. It will also go into nearly half the states of the Union. We want the news. It should be brief and yet full, and the proper names carefully and plainly written. You can send by some one, or by mail, Sign the name of the writer, though the name will not be published. We only ask it so we may be sure everything is right. Many things occur, such as weddings, parties, deaths, births, church socials and other meetings, etc., etc. As soon as a church social or other meeting is known, a notice should be sent to the COURIER, and we will gladly help to get it before the people. If we happen to be crowded or the item comes late, we reserve the right to shorten it. But send it any how.

Plague on the Errors.

We made a queer typographical error in the COURIER last week where we said that J. C. Henry, of the "Fair," had purchased a lot of "shirts" of the Auburn Woolen Mills. We meant to say "skirts," for that was what Mr Henry had bought. It has long been agreed that the skirts for ladies' use, made at the Auburn Woolen Mills, were of a very superior quality, and this was what we were calling attention to. The error may be accounted for in several ways. First, in the proof we read, this letter may not have been plain, and the "h" may have resembled a "k," and so we did not correct it. On the other hand, we don't pretend to know as much about these garments as do some other Auburn men we could name, and not having any of them at hand to call attention to the correct thing, we have been made the innocent subject of fifteen or twenty "See here's" as we passed up or down street. However, we have it right this week—so we are told.

Syrian Home Life.

Prof. A. M. Rihbany, the young man from Mt. Lebanon, Syria, who spoke at the Lutheran and Methodist churches, Sunday, will give another lecture, at the Presbyterian church, to-morrow evening, at 7:30 o'clock. Subject: "Syrian Home Life." The speaker will appear in his native costume and disclose the condition of the daily life in the Holy Land, the ways in visiting, eating, sleeping, the ceremonies attendant upon marriages, funerals, etc. The ways of living in that land are entirely different from American ways. The lecture will be very interesting. In order that all may hear this lecture, Prof. Rihbany has made the admission ten cents. The proceeds are to go to assist this gentleman in his theological studies, so don't forget the date.

TOBACCO—CIGARS.

A Bit of Interesting History Concerning Nicotiana and Its Uses.

Among the almost innumerable subjects about which authors of various distinction write, none are more conspicuous in the commercial realms than the subject of tobacco. That tobacco is a product of American origin, and that the knowledge of its uses was wafted to the rest of the world from our own illustrious country, is no longer a matter of serious controversy, or doubt. By careful research it will be learned that the discovery of its uses was made in November, 1492, by a company sent out by Columbus to explore the island of Cuba. On their return to the vessels, they reported as to having seen people who carried lighted firebrands and perfumed themselves with a peculiar kind of herbs a supply of which, each one carried. The habit of taking snuff is said to have been "observed and described" by Ramon Pane, a Franciscan, who was with Columbus on his second voyage, 1494—6. The more modern habit of chewing was not known until the fifteenth century, when it was first seen by the Spaniards, on the coast of South America. It seems that the term "tobacco" was not originally a common name by which this peculiarly plant was known, but we get the term through the usage of an instrument for inhaling its smoke, employed by the inhabitants of Hispaniola (Historia de las Indias Occidentales.) The tobacco plant itself was taken into Europe by Francisco Fernandes, in 1558. The susceptibility of the tobacco plant is such that it can be grown in many countries in very dissimilar climates. Wherever grown, its cultivation requires great skill and care, and by the time it is ready for the manufacturers' use, vast amounts of labor have been expended in the production of a good article. Enormous quantities are consumed in the manufacture of cigars; to say nothing about the quantities used in the manufacture of plug, fine-cut and smoking tobaccos. All qualities of tobacco are not suited to cigar making. Only certain classes are adapted to that kind of manufacturing. The northwest portions of Cuba, produce the finest qualities of cigar tobaccos in the world. The highest quality is produced in the district of Vuelta Abajo; the next best, being a product of Partidas and Vuelta Arriba. Java and Sumatra also export immense quantities of cigar tobacco, the most of which pass through the markets of Amsterdam and Rotterdam. "Havana cigars are, as regards form, classification, method of putting up, and nomenclature, the models followed by manufacturers of all classes of the goods. The highest class of Cuban made cigars, called 'Vegueras,' are prepared from the very finest Vuelta Abajo leaf, rolled when it is just half dry. Cigars are classed according to strength, as claro, colorado claro, maduro and oscuro." Tobacco growing and tobacco consumption being quite American, it is but natural to presume that the United States registers very largely in the ratio of consumers in that line. One of the most pleasant things to a tobacco user is the aroma of a fragrant cigar. Thousands of people smoke cigars, but it is not always possible to get the first-class cigar. Kessler Brothers, of Auburn, Indiana, however, are putting upon the market a cigar that in quality of tobacco, general get-up, and high-grade workmanship exceeds any former efforts on their part to cater to the whims of sensitive smokers. The K. & B. ten-cent cigar is the most popular in the great state of Indiana.

The candies at the Union Bokery are fresh of course, for they are made there. An expert candy maker is employed there, and he makes candy every day.

Ashley Times—Isaac Hague, wife and daughter, of Auburn, and Ulysses Raut, of the same place, were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hoover last Sabbath.

The Christian Endeavor people were well patronized at the Presbyterian church last Friday evening, and they entertained their patrons very pleasantly.

Our friend, D. N. Terry, of St. John, is to be the new postmaster at that point. While we fail to see where any money comes in, yet we think our friend D. N. is entitled to the honor, at least.

Ernest Williams has gone to Fort Wayne, and expects to remain there. He is, as usual, in great demand as a musician, and will take charge of an orchestra in that city, and besides is already engaged to play in the Third Regiment Military Band.

Among the Courier's staunch friends who braved the cold weather last Saturday to come and call on us, were Samuel Miller and wife, of the east part of the county and Jacob Recktenwald and wife, of the southwest part. They are always welcome.

We publish this week a poem, "Untold," written by Dr. Lida Leasure of Angola, and read before a recent meeting of the Auburn L. L. C., of which she was so many years a member. Like all her writings, both prose and verse, it has rare merits, and will repay a careful perusal.

C. C. Shaffer is able to be up town now, though he is obliged to use two crutches. It will be remembered he was hurt a short time ago by falling from his grape arbor, as mentioned in the Courier. Mrs. Shaffer slipped and fell one day last week, and she is also laid up at present.

Married:—At the residence of the officiating minister, Rev. W. L. Meese, in Auburn, Nov. 16, 1893, Mr. William Blodgett to Miss Pluma Miller. Both are residents of this vicinity. Mr. Blodgett is a son of Arnold Blodgett, who lives east of Auburn, and the bride, a daughter of Mr. John E. Miller of Wilmington township.

Lagrange Register—The Indiana Building at the World's fair was sold to a wrecking company at Chicago, Thursday, for $1,200. It was the largest price paid for any state building on the fair grounds. Most of the decorations and furniture was reserved by the contributors and manufacturers, and will be returned to them. That remaining will go to the state benevolent institutions.

Some sneak thief is having plenty of dried beef to eat. On Saturday evening, shortly after six o'clock, there were several specimens of meats, etc. hanging up in front of Gillis' meat market, but when they went out to bring them in, one piece was missing, and has not returned yet. It was a ten-pound piece of nice dried beef. As they have a well founded idea who the thief is, it would be well for them to return it and avoid trouble.

While Mrs. Lizzie Kelley was in Chicago recently, she lost her pocket book and, supposing it had been stolen, gave it up for lost. Tuesday, however, John Hebel called her attention to a letter he had received from a lady in Chicago who had found it on the street. She found in it a receipted bill of Mr. Hebel's and in this way got his name and wrote to him, asking if he knew such a person. Mrs. Kelley is now corresponding with the lady, and will soon have the lost articles back.

Geo. Lee's laundry sign was stolen Sunday night by some smart Alec hoodlums. Monday he fixed up another and that evening it was also stolen. Of course the signs are left somewhere in town, and he asks anyone who finds either one, to come and let him know and he will be greatly obliged for the favor. George Lee is as industrious and civil as any citizen we have, and much more worthy than some we could name who do not even try to make an honest living. We think the officers of the law and all good citizens should assist in preventing any more annoyances to him from a hoodlum element that Auburn unfortunately has.

M. B. Masters has a chicken that is a real curiosity. The other evening J. B. Roberts was buying some chickens of him, when on picking up one of them it was noticed there was something queer about it. On examination it was found to have only one wing, the other side being perfectly free from any sign of that very useful appendage. Mr. Masters concluded to keep it for a curiosity.

Ligonier Banner—It is claimed that to determine the exact age of eggs, dissolve about four ounces of common salt to a quart of pure water and then immerse the egg. If it be only a day or so old it will sink to the bottom, but if it be three days old it will float in the liquid. If more than five, it comes to the surface and rises above in proportion to its increased age. There were eggs marketed here last week that could not have been kept inside a quart cup with a club.

The lectures Sunday afternoon and evening by Prof. Rihbany were intensely interesting and full of valuable knowledge. He is a native of Syria and can speak from knowledge of the evils of Turkish rule and the undesirable conditions resulting from the Mohammedan religion that prevails there. He was at one time a newspaper man, being connected with a Syrian paper published in New York. He is now fitting himself for a life of christian usefulness as a missionary in the Holy Land. He speaks tomorrow, Friday, evening at the Presbyterian church on "Home Life in Syria.

Shelby Democrat—The farmers are finding out that the poultry and egg industry is one of the most profitable things they can engage in. The dry season has been favorable for young stock, and cheap wheat has been freely used, and the quality resulting is especially fine. While the prices may rule low the farmers will realize more money than with higher prices and a short crop, and we poor town people can afford an occasional fowl, too.

UNTOLD,

Over the purple hills I've watched
A sunset cloud—soft as a dream,
Rosy in hue, dappled with gold,
Brilliant with light in every beam;
But to common-place words is not given
The power to show the spell
Over my heart that fell
And made it seem like a glimpse of heaven.

I have read from a well worn volume,
A poem I've ever loved best,
Matchless in rythm—in thought sublime,
In the purest of language expressed;
My every pulse in feeling with the poet,
With the music of his rhyme
Has beat in perfect time,
But only my heart in my heart could know it.

The opera that thrills with an art divine
And leaves the tender afterglow,
Soulful chords from the master's hand,
Flute-like music soft and low
That comes stealing through the distance,
Or the great organ's swell,
Has brought this self same spell,
That in words has no existence.

Standing lone on the wave-washed shore,
Looking out on the boundless sea,
I've felt once more this finer sense
Come stealing softly over me.
While I listened to the wild waves' roaring,
With their constant throbbing,
Like a giant sobbing,
Their deep plaint to Nature's heart outpouring.

The artist's canvas breathing life,
The starlit vault of dewy night,
And more than all deep soul-lit eyes
That speak a heart's affection bright,
Can wake the pleasure there's no revealing,
Make things that are terrestrial
Take on a touch celestial,
And merge all sense of being into feeling.

This sense of beauty from God to man
That stamps the soul of heaven a part,
No need to tell, for each can feel,
And heart can read from human heart,
As the eye can read from an open scroll
The marks of divinity
That shine through infinity,
So we lay them away in our soul.

A MOTHER should have tender and loving but firm control of her child from its first breath. She should, above all things, set it a daily example of justice and truthfulness in the smallest affairs.

THE latest news from Robert Louis Stevenson, brought to San Francisco by a reporter who interviewed him in his Samoan home, is that the novelist is wofully thin and pale. His face is gaunt and haggard and wears an expression of continual weariness. In fact, he is ill most of the time, but uniformly good natured in spite of his afflictions. The fact is stated by this same reporter that Mrs. Stevenson smokes cigarettes, of which her husband is so fond.

WITH the return of Mrs. J. Coleman Drayton to America the old question arises as to whether her mother, Mrs. Astor, will try to reinstate her in society. It is probable that some effort will be made in this direction. Of all the people concerned in the miserable Drayton-Milbank-Borrowe scandal, Mrs. Drayton alone bore herself with dignity. Her husband acted like a fool, and that young milksop, Barrowe, conducted himself idiotically.

DURING the recent trip in which she broke the translantic record, the Lucania's longest run from noon to noon, the longest, ever made, was 560 miles. Allowing the time actually elapsed in thus chasing the sun westward to have been twenty-four hours and fifty minutes, a little figuring, credits the ship with the speed of nearly twenty-three knots an hour—says, twenty-two and three-quarters, or, as we would say when ashore, nearly twenty-seven miles, such as measure the speed of express trains.

THE death of a man nearly two hundred years old in Mexico, whose age is said to be amply attested by documents, is a remarkable event—less so, however, than that centennial of the wedding of a couple in Hungary, which was attended by the Arch-Duke and rightly made an affair of national festivity. We wonder if the States can produce anything to match these examples of prolonged vigor. Such lives, as a rule, are not restlessly productive, but they have an abiding interest as showing how long the vital process can be kept up, —a subject that is not without its personal fascination for all of us.

THE crank who attempted to extort money from Edwin Gould is now posing as a martyr because he was confined for a short time in a cell which was not to his liking, and claims that he had no thought of injuring Mr. Gould. This is a very natural statement since the fellow had no chance to carry out whatever designs he may have had; but there are few who will take stock in what he has to say after the affair is over with. There is a sure cure for dangerous cranks and that is to put them where they can do no harm. It is also noticed that this salutary treatment has a remarkable tendency to keep other men out of the business.

THE official investigation of the recent railway disaster in Michigan calls to mind similar casualties that happened thirty or forty years ago. The cars caught fire either from the stove or from the lamps. That much is admitted, and the only question is whether the oil or the coal is to blame. It is a useless inquiry. So long as cars are heated by blazing coals and lighted by kerosene a repetition of the Battle Creek horror is liable to occur at any time. If railway companies are too parsimonious or too indifferent about the safety of passengers to abandon the primitive methods of heating and lighting cars, then the law should intervene with a compulsory measure. Coal and kerosene are utterly out of place in modern railway transit.

A LAW practically nullifying ecclesiastic marriages is likely to be adopted in Austria. A bill, prepared by the Permier with that object in view has been indorsed by the Emperor and the Cabinet. It makes the civil service compulsory in all marriages. The measure is bitterly opposed by the clergy, and is sure to meet with disfavor by a large class of people. What the Government hopes to accomplish by the innovation is thus far only a matter of surmise. It cannot make the matrimonial obligation any more binding. A wedding under the impressive forms of the church certainly makes a more lasting impression than the brief formality of civil marriage. It is the strength of the silken cord, not the style of knot, that must be relied upon in a matrimonial union.

TERRE HAUTE is about the only American city in which the anti-vaccinationists have been able to gain adherents. There have been anti-vaccination troubles in London and in the foreign quarters of New York City, but in both cities the compulsory vaccination law has eventually been enforced. In Terre Haute, however, the courts have decided that the Board of Health cannot compel compliance with the local ordinance requiring all school children to be vaccinated, and certain pig-headed persons have taken advantage of the ruling. The prospect is that the enlightened portion of the citizens will have to keep their children away from school or subject them to the risk of infection. It is evident that Terre Haute is much in need of enlightenment. They will be burning witches down there presently.

"IF we were disposed to moralize," says William Waldorf Astor in his toad-eating Pall Mall Gazette, referring to the assassination of Mayor Harrison, "we might see in this lamentable affair an object lesson against the methods of municipal government that obtain throughout the United States." Of course he might. Sycophant and renegade, he can always find an excuse for abusing his native country. His subserviency to English masters is too well known to require any admission of the fact from him. It is to be hoped, however, that the foreign correspondents will cease to cable his utterances to this country. No one here cares what he says or thinks. The less he is heard of the less shame will be felt by Americans that such a pitiful object should be entitled to call America his birthplace.

GUNNING for millionaires in San Francisco bids fair to become a leading pastime if not indeed an established pot-hunting industry. The court fixed the penalty for the shooting of bonanza king Mackey by old man Rippey at $250 or 125 days in jail. This scarcely exceeds the penalty for hunting quail out of season, and gunners "out" for big game can find more and better sport right in that city, and without the trouble of climbing over rugged hills. One wonders if Rippey had taken in a job lot of say half a dozen bonanza kings instead of one, whether it might not have come even cheaper; perhaps to $25 or 50 days in retirement. The friends of the poor old man, however, must rejoice that he chose that mode of self indulgence in a little frolic, rather than to have stolen a pair of boots, for instance. Bull's hide has apparently become so much more precious than human blood that for such an offense the sportive old chap would probably have been consigned to the penitentiary for practically a life period.

The Bengal Boar.

Possibly in moments of enthusiasm and wassail the Bengal boar may have been overpraised. He has not a pleasant temper, his habits are open to unfavorable criticism, he may fail in his family relations—but he has plenty of pluck. He will fight anything that comes in his way; not even a tiger daunts him, and, what is more, the tiger sometimes succumbs to the terrible tushes of the boar.

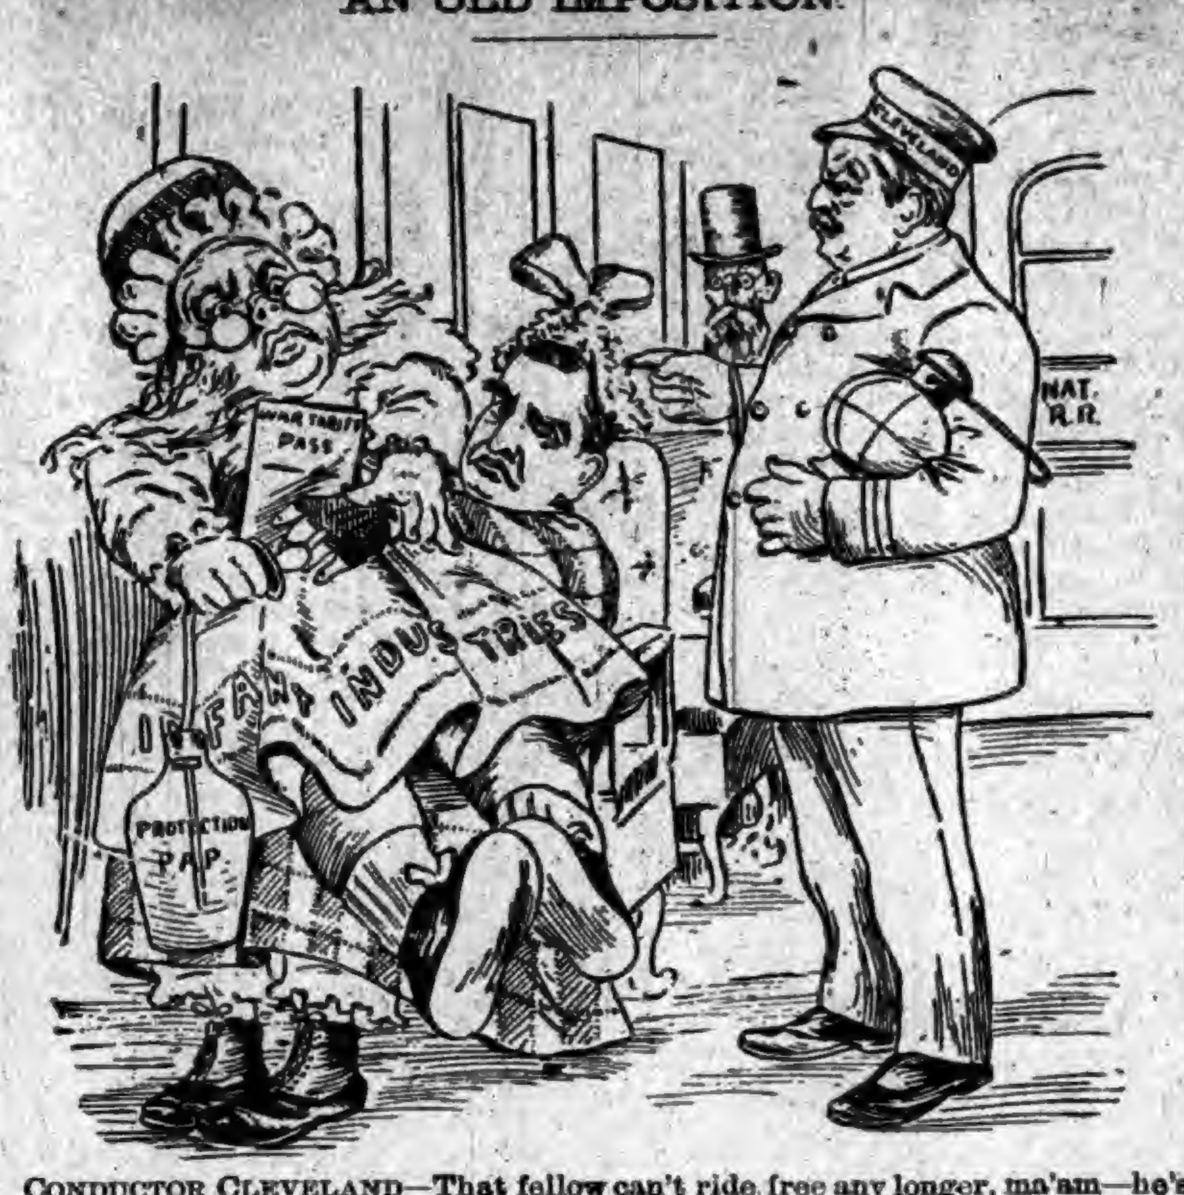
I have seen a boar bearing away from such heroic battle the marks—deep and frequent marks—of a tiger's claws, and that boar swam the Ganges in flood—a sufficient feat for an unwounded animal, and one that should set at rest the question whether pigs can swim.

A dangerous brute is that Bengal boar. Throughout the whole of my sporting career only two of my beaters were killed, and one of these was cut to death by a boar; a leopard killed the other; not one was either killed or mauled by tigers.

But my first experiences in this line were, I regret to say, less connected with the mighty boar than with the sow, which, though it cannot rip up a horse's flanks or belly as can the boar, can gallop a little, and, instead of ripping, can bite.—Blackwood's Magazine.

WHEN a man makes up a trouble with his wife, he doesn't seek to remove the cause of the offense, but to convince her she is unreasonable.

AN OLD IMPOSITION.



CONDUCTOR CLEVELAND—That fellow can't ride free any longer, ma'am—he's big enough to pay for himself!—Puck.

THE PARTY ON TRIAL.

An Impartial Revision of the Tariff Democracy's Only Salvation.

The Democratic party is now on trial for its life. It has been commissioned by the people to make a tariff for revenue law and, in doing so, abolish the "fraud" protection. Twice have the people spoken with their mighty voice. Once negatively, in 1890, to condemn McKinleyism; once positively, in 1892, to approve the Democratic program laid out at Chicago. Since 1892 there has been no national issue voted upon by the people and there is now but little reason to believe that the cool, deliberate judgment has changed on the tariff question; though if they had a chance to express themselves, they might raise a vigorous protest against the tardiness and timidity of the Democrats in beginning action against the tariff robber. If, however, the Ways and Means Committee reports a radical and reasonably just tariff bill, and the House and Senate pass it promptly, there is every reason to believe that the people will not withdraw the confidence they have placed in the Democratic party. The result of the recent election, in so far as it had a national meaning, was intended only as a reprimand to the Democrats for their slowness in getting rid of the obnoxious and panic-producing silver law and as a warning against similar delay in dealing with the tariff.

There is rough sailing ahead for the Democratic party if it not only does not turn out any tariff bill before next summer, but if that bill shall be, as the McKinley bill is, a composite of selfish interests. If every Tom, Dick and Harry who are interested in protected industries and who pretend to be Democrats, are to be allowed to dictate the next tariff and to defeat an honest, impartial and radical revision, Democratic representatives should make ready their life-preservers, for their ship will go down when it is struck by the next wave of popular indignation. If it were possible to please all of the people by giving sectional and selfish interests full play, then the McKinley bill should have been approved by all States; for if any State was slighted it was not McKinley's fault. He gave to all who asked if they asked for any particular industry and locality, and not simply for that indefinite something—the welfare of all in the country.

The people at large, or at least a sufficient number to sway elections, are quick to distinguish between an honest broad-guage tariff and a truckling miserable makeshift; and they have the patriotism to support such a measure even if the special interest of their own locality be denied further governmental aid. They realize the justice of impartiality and of leaving each industry to shift for itself. They have more courage than some of the so-called representatives in Congress who are afraid to say nay to the selfish clamor of a few of their wealthy constituents. Let a Congressman rise above sectionalism, vote for the good of the whole country, have faith in the patriotism of his constituents, and he will not only benefit his party, but probably also himself. Patriotism is far more likely to bring success than demagogism.

If the Democratic party at the critical time shrinks from action, or shirks its duty to fulfill its promises, it need not trouble itself about its future—it will have none. Quick, sharp, decisive action, which shall wipe out the last vestige of McKinleyism, give us free raw materials and lower the cost of living will receive the plaudits and votes of millions of people. Try them!—Byron W. Holt.

A Precedent.

If it is seriously urged that the course of Congress in revising the tariff should be affected by the late vote of the North, we think it will be easily found that the high tariff men have furnished themselves a precedent which fully justifies tariff reformers in disregarding it. The McKinley tariff was passed under conditions when it was really condemned by the people in advance. In the first place, it was a fraud in the way the sense of the people was tested with regard to it in the campaign that elected President Harrison and gave it a majority in Congress. The impression generally prevailed all through the election of 1888 that duties were to be equalized, not raised. But accepting that as a verdict for raising them, and what followed? The McKinley tariff was not passed till 1890. In the meantime another election had been held, and in it the supporters of high protection had been routed all through the North. In New York, in Ohio, in Iowa, and almost even in Massachusetts, all of which states had voted for Harrison, and (according to Republican claims) for high protection, there had been revolutions at the polls which had given tariff reform great gains and reversed the verdict. What did the Republicans do in such a contingency? Accept the popular verdict as against them, as they are now asking the Democrats to do? As far from it as possible. They went at once to work and passed the McKinley tariff in its most odious features, entirely ignoring the decision of the country, which had declared against McKinleyism, precisely as they would have the people believe it has declared against tariff reduction now. They thus set an example which they are the last men in the world who have a right to complain of the Democrats for following. What would be more inconsistent than for them to claim a different course on the part of their opponents?—Boston Herald.

No Backward Step.

The Democratic party cannot afford to purchase the "six votes of Louisiana," as Congressman Blanchard puts it, by reimposing the tariff on sugar that was taken off by the McKinley bill. Apart from the principle involved, the bargain would be a bad one, for it would cost the party in the next Congress at least thrice six votes from the West and Northwest.

The placing of sugar on the free list was the greatest blunder the Protectionists have made in the long battle over the tariff. It is carried into every household in the land demonstrative proof that the tariff is a tax; that our own people pay it; that it raises the price of the commodity on which it is imposed, and that prices can be cheapened by taking it off. Every householder who learned that the sugar duty had been removed, and then found by experience that as a consequence he could buy twenty pounds of sugar for a dollar where he had previously got only twelve pounds, had received an object-lesson that no argument could discredit. In the light of this practical experience the preposterous plea that cheapness is degrading—that "a cheap coat makes a cheap man"—was simply laughed at. The West and the Northwest were won for tariff reform by the adroit use of this conclusive object-lession, and throughout the country cheapened sugar was pointed to as an indication of what a Democratic triumph would mean for the consumer.

If the duty is reimposed and millions of voters are thus taught that tariff reform means a higher price for the necessaries of life, the result cannot fail to be disastrous. The Democratic motto should be "Once on the free list always on the free list." There must be no backward step.—New York World.

Carlisle's Opportunity.

The report of Robert J. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury, which dealt with the revenue question and preceded the passage of the tariff act of 1846, was a state paper of such merit as to command the attention of the civilized world. It was a blow, at the right time, on the right side of a question which engaged the earnest attention of statesmen in Europe as well as in America, and it was instrumental in bringing about a proper determination. Secretary Carlisle has the incentive and the opportunity for a state paper of like tenor with the Walker report. He is a great master of lucid statement. The country may expect from him an equally clear and candid exposition of Democratic doctrine on the subject of taxation that will compel the conviction of impartial minds.—Philadelphia Record.

Urgency of Tariff Reform.

LET tariff reform go on as demanded by the best interests of the country.—Lynchburg (Va.) News.

THE necessity of tariff reform and reduction is as fully understood as ever before.—Buffalo Courier.

THERE is danger in every step that leads us away from the platform, and safety in every effort that we make to carry it into effect.—Atlanta Constitution.

OBSTRUCTION of the tariff bill, like opposition to the repeal of the Sherman act, will but delay the revival of business, which the country ardently desires.—Baltimore Sun

THE duty of the hour for the Democratic Congress is the revision of the tariff. It was this to which the party was pledged. Upon this pledge it was restored to power.—Kansas City Times.

IT is important that tariff reform be enacted as speedily as possible in order that the people may discover by experience that it is not the fearful thing of their imaginings.—Elmira Gazette.

PROMPT, decisive action by Congress on the tariff question is imperatively demanded; not only for the best interests of the country, but for the good of the Democratic party.—Newport Herald.

TARIFF reform must be pushed with all possible expedition. Such a course is demanded alike by the interests of the country and by considerations of party expediency.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

IT behooves the Democratic majority to proceed with all possible expedition to put upon the statute books its policy of tariff reform, so that industry may know what to expect.—Springfield Republican.

IT is scarcely reasonable to suppose that President Cleveland will accept the vote of the 7th inst. as a revision of public judgment upon the questions of tariff reform and silver coinage.—Chicago Record.

THE Democrats should as speedily as possible give the country the law which it is their intention to enact, so that any element of doubt may be removed from the situation.—Cedar Rapids (Iowa) Gazette.

CONGRESS would be especially derelict if it failed in this [revision of the tariff], for no Congress ever was elected with clearer instructions, repeated after two years of deliberation and discussion.—Philadelphia Times.

THE lesson to the Democratic party of the election is that the pledges of the platform upon which it was intrusted with power must be kept, and that tariff revision must be effected as speedily as possible.—Bridgeport Farmer.

THE extra session of Congress has cleared the way, by the repeal of the silver-purchase law, for the other and more important work of tariff reform. In regard to that reform, there must be no hesitation, no delay.—Grand Rapids Democrat.

THE people voted for tariff reform. They desire nothing radical or unreasonable. They do not wish manufacturers ruined or Western farmers driven to the woods. Reform, moderate, just to all, they are going to have.—Providence Telegram.

AREA WILL DECREASE

PROBABLE RESULT OF THE DEPRESSED WHEAT MARKET.

Foolish Terror of Speculators Caused by the Visible Supply—Some Facts and Figures—Funeral of General Rusk—The Detroit Fire.

Hope for the Bulls.

The wheat trade according to the Chicago Post, is squatting in the shadow of a "visible supply" of 77,000,000 bushels—that is to say, that many bushels are "in sight" in the public warehouses at the present time, to say nothing of many more million bushels in private elevators. This great mountain of wheat, subject to the call of consumers, has driven every other consideration into the background. It has discouraged speculative investment and induced farmers to rush their surplus upon a reluctant and sorely pressed market as though fearful they might not be able to get anything for the grain unless they hurried. Producers are panic-stricken, and during the first twenty weeks of the current crop year, beginning July 1, a larger percentage of wheat has been shipped out of first hands than on any previous crop in the history of the grain trade. The wheat markets have been in the dumps all summer and fall, in spite of the fact of a short crop, and nothing seems able to lift them out of the slough.

Yet when the current statistics bearing on the wheat trade are analyzed in cold blood and with judicial impartiality, they are not particularly terrifying. At the beginning of the 1892 crop year, July 1, the visible supply was 24,262,000 bushels. Last July there were 62,316,000 bushels "in sight." During the twenty weeks that have elapsed since the beginning of July the visible supply has increased 14,437,000 bushels; last year, for the corresponding period, the increase was 45,274,000 bushels. Owing to the fact that it started 38,000,000 lower down the scale than this year, the aggregate on the corresponding date a year ago was less than now, and many who only look at the daily and weekly statements of stocks, not thinking or caring to inquire further, imagine that there has been a deluge of grain and that the "visible" is likely to reach 100,000,000 bushels or more. Yet comparisons show that during the twenty weeks from July 1 to Nov. 17 the movement of wheat from first hands, as gauged by the receipts at the leading Western points, aggregated 90,000,000 bushels, against 145,000,000 bushels the corresponding twenty weeks of 1892, a decrease of 55,000,000 bushels.

The next thirty days will determine whether reserves are in a bad state of impoverishment. Farmers' deliveries have already run down to small proportions. Prices at the present level are said by experts to be below the cost of production. People are not in the farming business to raise grain at a loss, any more than manufacturers are in industrial lines from philanthropic motives. Hence it is for a series of years the area devoted to the raising of wheat in this country has been undergoing a process of gradual shrinkage.

Shrinkage of Wheat Area.

The wheat area of 1892 was 1,350,000 acres less than 1891 and the area of 1893 was further reduced 4,000,000 acres. Advices from thousands of country correspondents in the great Western States foreshadow another reduction, the acreage for 1894 being estimated at 5 to 7 per cent. less than this year. Farmers have cut down their winter wheat acreage everywhere. Continued low prices until spring would be reflected in a diminished spring wheat breadth also, according to the information of those in closest touch with the great Northwest.

The following tables compiled from reports of the United States Department of Agriculture show the relations between low prices and decreased production. They afford a fruitful subject for study and thoughtful consideration. The tables are:

CROP AND FARM PRICES.

Year.	Crop, bu.	Average farm price.
1893	390,000,000	*53.0
1892	516,000,000	63.2
1891	612,000,000	85.3
1890	400,000,000	83.9
1889	490,000,000	69.8
1888	414,000,000	92.6
1887	456,329,000	68.1
1886	457,218,000	68.7

*Estimated.

GRADUAL REDUCTION IN AREA.

Year.	Spring acreage.	Winter acreage.	Total acreage.
1893	11,840,000	22,784,000	34,624,000
1892	12,565,000	25,989,000	38,554,000
1891	13,336,000	26,581,000	39,917,000
1890	12,567,000	23,520,000	36,087,000
1889	12,719,000	25,385,000	38,104,000
1888	13,283,000	23,954,000	37,237,000
1887	13,419,000	24,223,000	37,642,000
1886	12,274,000	24,532,000	36,706,000

Unless signs fail the wheat area next year will not exceed 33,000,000 acres, which at the average rate of production per acre would yield about 425,000,000 bushels. Assuming that the surplus of this and former years will be run down to a low ebb by the beginning of another crop year, a crop of only 425,000,000 bushels would leave less than 75,000,000 bushels for export, or less than half the average of recent years. With diminished production the long down-trodden bulls feel that they would have a right to expect an inning. It has been a "powerful long time a-comin'."

FUNERAL OF GEN. RUSK.

Masons, Knights Templars and the Grand Army Take Part.

On Thursday morning the family of Gen. Rusk surrounded his bier in the parlor of the little farm house, near Viroqua, Wis., that was so long his home, and in privacy listened to words of eulogy. At noon the remains were removed to the Methodist Church, where they remained in state until the funeral services proper at 2 p. m. Friday. The exercises were under the Masonic auspices, with a Knight Templar, Consistory and Grand Army escort. Special trains brought distinguished men from all over the country.

Many hundred messages expressing tender sympathy for the bereaved family were received, from such persons as President Harrison, all the living members of the cabinet, Gen. Fairchild, Gen. Alger, Secretary Morton, Senators Vilas, Spooner, Sawyer, Cullom and others in almost every city and State in the United States. The body was laid to rest in the family lot in the quiet little church yard.

THURSTON WILL STAY.

Not to Be Given His Passports by the State Department.

It was stated at the State Department, says a Washington correspondent, that there was abundant ground for giving Minister Thurston his passports. Minister Thurston, representing the provisional government of Hawaii, caused to be published a reply to Blount's report on the Hawaiian revolution, and in the statement he pointed out that Mr. Blount did not seek his evidence, although frequently charging him with being the leader of the revolution; he denies that United States troops took part in the overthrow of the Queen; asserts that the American troops did not land under two days after the revolution broke out, and gives a complete history of the revolt that seems to show conclusively that Blount was either misinformed as to the occurrences of the revolution or misrepresented the facts.

It is claimed that his letter is a breach of diplomacy and amply sufficient to warrant this government in immediately severing all relations with the Hawaiian Minister. Such action would be taken but for the reason that the American people might not think it fair play; that the right of any man to talk and give his side of a controversy is always conceded, and that to force Mr. Thurston to leave this country would be considered by the people a disposition not to allow the other side a hearing.

CRUSHED AND BURNED.

Two Men Jump to Their Death in the Big Fire in Detroit.

One of the worst fires that Detroit has had for many years completely destroyed the five-story building at Jefferson avenue and Bates street occupied by Edson, Moore & Co., wholesale dry goods, and damaged several adjacent buildings, causing a total loss of $700,000. Three men employed by the dry-goods firm lost their lives in the flames, and five others who are missing are also supposed to have perished. The fire started at 12:30 o'clock and so quick were the flames that in half an hour the building was completely gutted. Practically only the iron front remains. The department fought with a fire which fairly defied their efforts. The blaze was first seen on the fourth floor and looked as if it could be kept in subjection, but the flames spread as quickly as if the building were wood. It was said to be fireproof.

Long before the many engines responded to the general alarm two men could be seen on the window sill of the fifth story on the Bates street side of the building and a groan went up from the crowd. Then there were shouts: "Don't jump!" "Don't jump—there's help coming!" But even as those below called the flames behind them advanced and burst out around them. A bale of jute was procured by the spectators and placed below the window on which Bradley Dunning was perched. Driven by the flames which roared around him he sprang from the window and landed on the bale. He bounded off and fell to the sidewalk, where he lay limp and apparently lifeless. An ambulance carried him to the hospital, where he died soon after. By this time the firemen who had arrived spread a net to catch McKay, who fell into it. His injuries were such that he, too, died soon after being taken to a hospital. Hardly had this double tragedy taken place than another man was seen near the upper window nearest the corner. He was evidently nearly suffocated, for, although he succeeded in reaching the sill, his strength apparently gave out, and after an effort to raise himself, one arm having been thrown over the sill, he slowly sank back and disappeared from view, being swallowed up in the furnace behind him. He is thought to have been Edward Genther.

After the fire the firm established temporary headquarters and opened a register. By comparing notes it became evident that Genther, Rider, Voit, Markey, Baker, and Kirchner were missing. The firm's loss is $500,000, well insured. How the fire ignited is not known. The burned building was erected twelve years ago at a cost of $100,000. The loss, which is total, was covered by $50,000 insurance. Other business places were damaged to the extent of $80,000.

Tried and Approved by the Bilious.

For over a third of a century a great specific has been on trial by a national jury of the bilious. Although a verdict in its favor was rendered long since, it is still on trial. Never when it has been "weighed in the balance" has it been found wanting. The name of this medicine is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which more speedily than any other terminates those villainous sensations which attend disorder of the liver. It expels bile from the blood and secretions, remedies chronic costiveness, and reinduces the organ of digestion and assimilation. Sick headache, yellowness of the skin and eyeballs, furred tongue, and other indications that the liver has temporarily knocked off work and gone on a strike, disappear when it is used. It is a most efficient safeguard against malaria, rheumatism, and kidney trouble, and fortifies a nervous and enfeebled invalid effectually.

KENNEDY'S

MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

DONALD KENNEDY, OF ROXBURY, MASS.,

Has discovered in one of our common pasture weeds a remedy that cures every kind of Humor, from the worst Scrofula down to a common Pimple.

He has tried it in over eleven hundred cases, and never failed except in two cases (both thunder humor). He has now in his possession over two hundred certificates of its value, all within twenty miles of Boston.

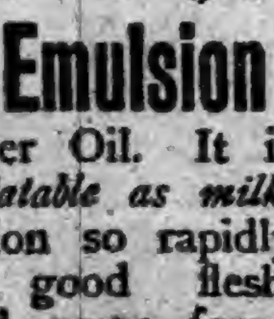
When the lungs are affected it causes shooting pains, like needles passing through them; the same with the Liver or Bowels. This is caused by the ducts being stopped, and always disappears in a week after taking it.

If the stomach is foul or bilious it will cause squeamish feelings at first.

No change of diet ever necessary. Eat the best you can get, and enough of it. Dose, one tablespoonful in water at bedtime. Read the Label. Send for Book.



It is very difficult to convince children that a medicine is "nice to take"—this trouble is not experienced in administering of Cod Liver Oil. It is almost as palatable as milk. No preparation so rapidly builds up good flesh, strength and nerve force. Mothers the world over rely upon it in all wasting diseases that children are heir to.

Scott's Emulsion

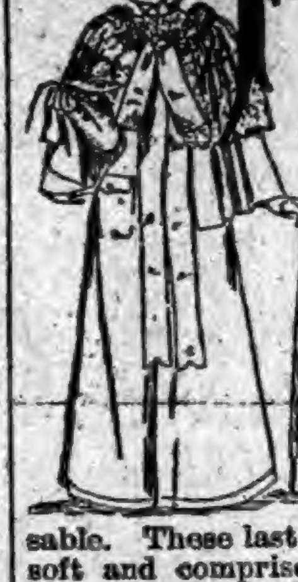
FASHIONS IN FURS.

MUFFS OF IMMENSE SIZE ARE TO BE WORN.

These Dreadful Whole "Beasties" Which Were So Popular as Tippets Last Winter Are to Again Bedeck the Necks of Women This Season.

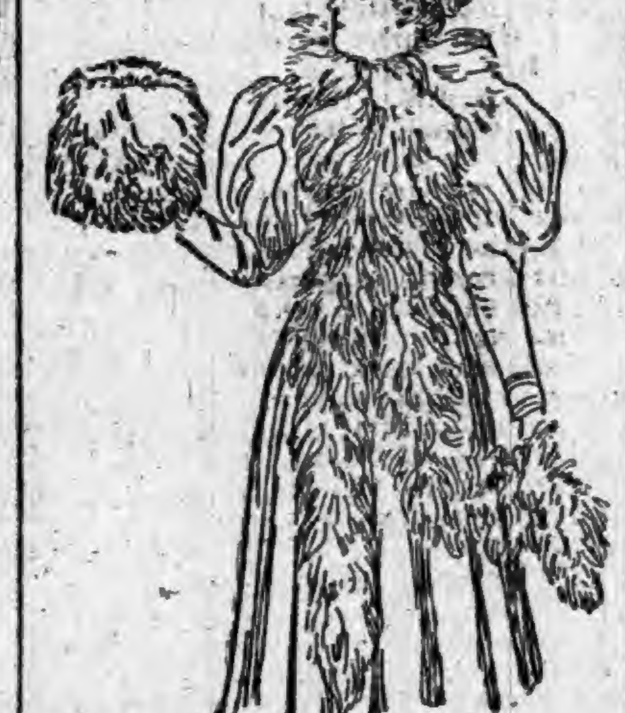
Gossip from Gay Gotham.

New York correspondence:



FURRIERS must be heartless men, for again this winter they plan to bedeck the throats of fair and gentle women with those dreadful whole "beasties" which were so popular as tippets last winter. They are no longer little, but are so big now that one wonders how the women dare put them on. They come at all prices, too, from a cheap marten, which, alas! is really pussy cat, to Hudson sable. These last are deep-furred and soft and comprise the whole animal, two little paws dangling in front with the head and two at the back with the little tail, any one of them enough to make a woman cry for pity. But what has a woman to do with pity where furs are concerned?

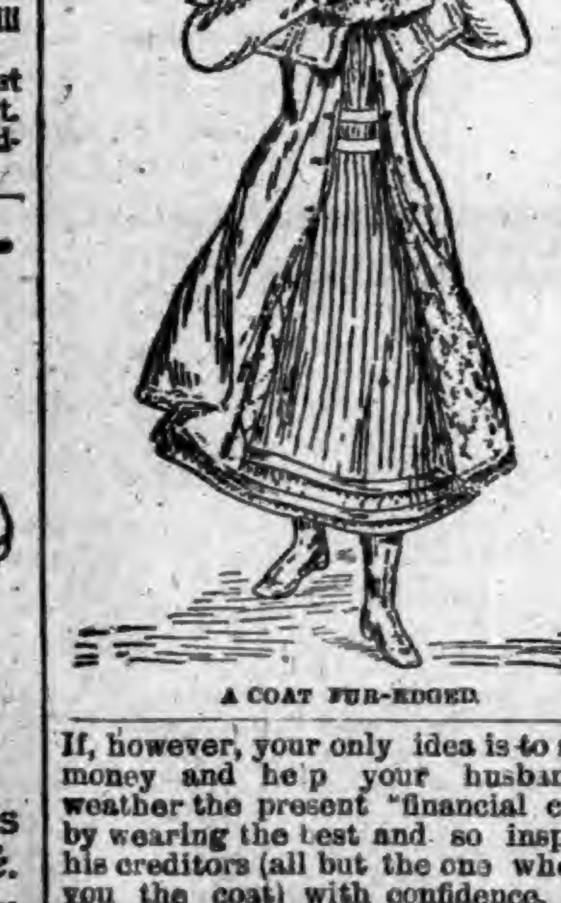
An odd feature of fashionable fur usage is that the amount of fur displayed in any one costume is wholly at the discretion of the wearer. Thus, a woman may be enveloped in a wrap that comes almost to the ground, and cover her head with a hat liberally trimmed with the same pelt, or she may, as in the costume of the initial picture, let the only bit of fur in her make-up appear in a narrow band about the brim of her felt hat. In general, the latter method is, perhaps, more in accordance with current acceptances, but both are permissible. The garment which the fur-trimmed hat accompanies is a coat of red cheviot. It consists of a coat proper, which buttons invisibly in front, to which is attached a circular cape which leaves a yoke-like portion of the coat exposed. This yoke is covered with black allover embroidery, which also appears on the collar. The latter is stiffened with crinoline and has a rolling edge. The lace cape is one hundred and thirty-five inches wide and eighteen inches deep, and the seam that joins the lace and cloth cape to the coat is covered with a full ribbon ruching. Besides the edging of fur the hat, which is in a shade of paris green, has its low crown encircled by a velvet band, and two velvet points and a pale green bird's head are placed in front. Behind these come two black and green changeable Mercury wings with a fanlike aigrette.



MUFFS ABOUT THIS SIZE.

A wearer whose choice is for more display of fur than can be put upon a hat is she of the second illustration. Her huge, handsome boa and the muff are of Russian seal, soft, fleecy and beautiful. Muffs are promised which shall so closely follow 1830 styles as to be simply huge, but it is not likely that the early winter will see many such, although the wee cold things which paraded as muffs in the recent past will surely be abandoned.

Sable remains the choicest fur next to ermine and is made up into handsome deep capes, with or without butterfly collars. There is a great difference in the price of sable, and almost a corresponding difference in length of fur and softness of texture and color. Sealskin always holds its place. This season it is darker and silkier than ever, and that means that it has been extraordinarily subjected to dyeing and scraping. That in turn means that your sealskin will hardly look well a season through. Therefore, if you really want a seal, you'd better have it made into a cape, because a cape gets less wear than does a coat, having no sleeves to rub, no outside pockets to wear and also escaping a good deal of wear in sitting down that a coat gets.

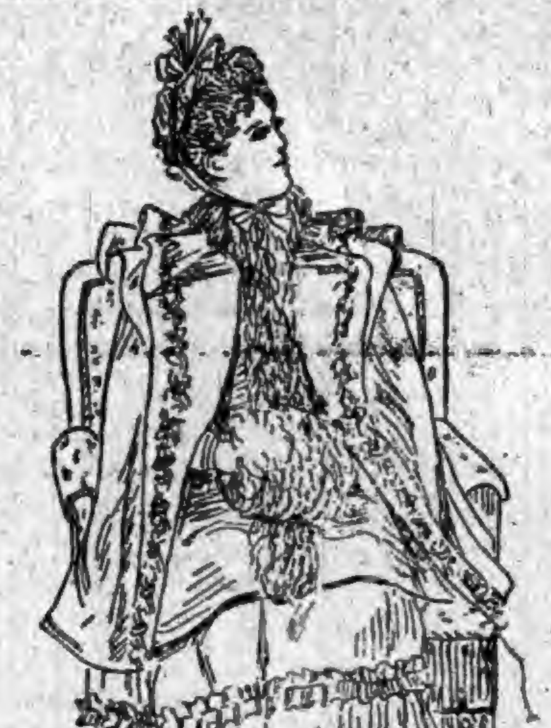


A COAT FUR-EDGED.

If, however, your only idea is to spend money and help your husband to weather the present "financial crisis" by wearing the best and so inspiring his creditors (all but the one who sold you the coat) with confidence, then have a sealskin frock coat. Let the skirts be very full, the sleeves very large at the shoulders, and the revers either faced with astrakhan or ermine.

Anyone would know that the little girl of the next picture was new to her muff, for she is not content with holding it in its proper place, but must lift it to her eyes to admire its pretty shade of tan, rub it against her chin to test its softness and blow into it to satisfy herself of its thickness. Many times must the muff go through these approving processes, and many confiding smiles must it receive before it begins to age in its young wearer's appreciation. The fur here is beaver, and a narrow edging of it is seen about the hem, fronts, cuffs and cape of the coat. Some would add a strip of it to the hat, but all such matters are left to personal choice. The coat itself is of cloth, and lined with quilted pink satin, the fronts and back being pleated to a yoke. The back has a wide box pleat held in place at the waist by a fancy braid strap, and the slashed collar is lined with plain silk.

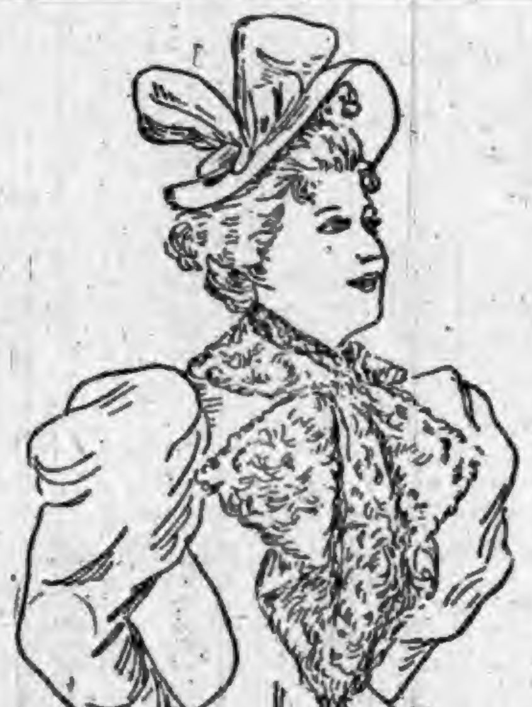
Ermine is being used chiefly in combination with other furs, notably with seal. Very elegant frock coats of dark seal have vests let in of ermine, and the shoulder puff and collar of the same. An ermine muff, too, should be carried. Ermine also comes in sets consisting of the big old-time muff of our grandparents, a tippet also like the ones the old-time dames wore, and cuffs. Such a set is worn with a velvet or seal cloak. Ermine is also used to line opera cloaks, the outside being in delicate shades of soft silk or velvet. A regal cape of seal reaching generously below the hips is lined with ermine and can be worn either side out, the dark side outside for the street and the reverse for the theater.



ANOTHER FURRED WRAP.

In the fourth sketch there is another fur trimmed wrap, worn with a boa and muff to match. In this model, a suitable one for young matrons, the material is black cloth made up without lining. The circular double collar consists of cloth on the lower, and gros grain on the upper side, the upper collar coming down the fronts of the wrap and being trimmed with jet. This collar and the fitted fronts are garnished with the fur.

Astrakhan is to be much worn and the Persian comes very high. The hair is longer than ever and loosely curled. One wonders if the cultivators of furs have been dosing and rubbing their astrakhan animals all summer with hair tonic stuffs. Astrakhan is made up in frock coats and capes and is to be much used for trimming cloth gowns. To meet the craze for "black and white" it is made up with ermine, but somehow it does not look just right, for the astrakhan seems too common for the ermine. Monkey is still used and is cheaper than it was last year, but it is most awfully ugly now as always, and after all not much nicer than its own frequent imitator, dyed goat fur. Marten, not unlike sable of the commoner quality, is a good stand-by fur and inexpensive. A fur lately introduced is called Janet, and is for lining long cloaks. It is soft, almost too soft to stand well the wear that comes on a lining, of a delicate brown color and not expensive.



AT ONCE A PROTECTION AND AN ORNAMENT.

The novelty of this season is the little butterfly cape gotten up in sable, ermine, astrakhan or seal. It is made with a high flaring collar and is so full that it stands out in scallops which are so deep that the lining shows. These little affairs are made with great attention to detail, two or three kinds of fur being put into them often, as a seal one that has vandykes of astrakhan about the edge and a lining of ermine, the tails set about the lower edge with just the black tip projecting. These little capes cost extravagently and there is little warmth to them. Tails are much used for trimming fur cloaks and dresses. Mink tails are set together and used for fringes and so are ermine tails.

Of course, there are few good imitations of really fine and very costly sealskin, but one, the "cony" or Paris seal, comes pretty near it and is much cheaper. For seventy dollars a long cloak to the hips and a little below can be bought which will look for all the world like its four-hundred-dollar neighbor. The fur is the same color, a shade deeper than the seal, perhaps, and lacking a bit in the flexibility of the seal, but to all practical purposes just as handsome as the seal, and so near like it that it will fool any one but a woman who is attempting the deception herself. Besides, it will outlast the real article by two seasons.

It would be hard to say whether the furred front of the plush jacket in the final picture is more for ornament or for protection. It has such a fragmentary appearance that at first glance it would seem worthless as a security against the cold, but it still is a protection for the chest, while being a decided addition to the jacket's appearance. That garment is made of black plush, is thinly wadded and lined with black satin merveilleux. The fur is Persian lamb.

The Farm.

The farm is one continuous experiment station. A large measure of the success reached by any farmer is due to the knowledge gained from this experimentation.

Indestructible Paint.

A German chemist has invented and perfected a process which, it is claimed, will revolutionize the method of decorating buildings as at present followed. The most important feature of the process is that it is applied in as simple a form, and at as inexpensive a cost, as common house paint, and is as readily applicable to inside walls and ceilings. From a sanitary point of view the new medium forms one of the most important advances of the times. Once applied, the fresco coating is said to be absolutely indestructible, being unaffected by temperature or chemicals. It is impervious to damp, and will admit of an indefinite amount of scrubbing and cleaning. Walls and ceilings thus treated can be rendered free from disease germs by washing with acids.

The Smart Little Boy.

Teacher—Now, dear children, as you have been good to-day, I'll give you a conundrum to answer. It is this: "When we are young we want to have it and when we have got it, we no longer have any use for it."

Tommy—I know what it is.

"What is it, Tommy?"

"It is a wife."

"Who told you that was the answer?"

"I heard my father say so."

Teacher (thoughtfully)—That is not so far out of the way, after all, but the answer I meant was maturity. When we are young we want to be older and when we have attained age we no longer want it, but as your father remarked, Tommy, it is the same with a wife. The class is dismissed.—Texas Siftings.

English Mourning Etiquet.

The period of mourning for a father-in-law is twelve months—ten months black, two months, half mourning; crepe is seldom worn, although the crepe period was formerly six months. For a parent the period is the same as above. The longest period for a brother is six months—five months black, one month half mourning. The crepe period was formerly three months; it is now almost discarded. The shortest period is four months black, no half mourning. We may remark that the period of mourning for a father-in-law is often shortened to six months when relatives reside at a considerable distance from each other.—London Times.
